VIGIL FOR THE THIRTEEN: A rally, organized by Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) Ontario Region and UJA FEDERATION of Greater Toronto, was held Sunday at Earl Bales Park in Toronto on behalf of the 13 Iranian Jews whose trial on charges of espionage recommenced behind closed doors. Rabbi Amram Assayag, Chief Rabbi, Sephardic Rabbinate of Ontario addressed nearly 300 people. Thirteen members of Young Judea each held a sign on which was written the name of an accused. See story on page 32. [Ron Csillag photos]

Recalling her trial

By DEBORAH E. LIPSTADT
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

In 1995, when I opened a letter informing me that David Irving was suing me for libel for calling him a Holocaust denier, I had precisely the same reaction that I had 20 years earlier when I first heard that there were people who denied the Holocaust. I laughed.

Why, I wondered, take this seriously? Holocaust deniers reminded me of flat-earth theorists. The idea was preposterous.

Irving's charges seemed equally preposterous. He had repeatedly denied the Holocaust. At the trial of Ernst Zundel, in Toronto, he said there was no "Reich policy to kill the Jews" and "no documents whatsoever show that a Holocaust had ever happened."

In Germany, Irving declared the Holocaust a "blood lie [which] has been pronounced on the German people." In 1991, he dropped mention of the Holocaust from his new edition of Hitler's biography because "if something didn't happen then you don't even dignify it with a footnote."

Given this record how could he claim that I libelled him by calling him a denier? This was, I presumed, a nuisance lawsuit, full of sound and fury but signifying nothing.

A couple of lawyers' letters, I naively assumed, and all would be resolved. But Irving was doing this in England where the laws favour the plaintiff. I had to prove the truth of what I said. He did not have to prove the falsehood.

Irving talks not only about what has been done to Jews, but what will be done to them.

Stanley Cup coach going to Israel

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Dallas Stars may be in the middle of the NHL playoffs right now, but it's a trip to Israel this summer that's got head coach Ken Hitchcock really excited. Well, a chance at a second Stanley Cup may still be his number one concern, but a summertime trip to Israel would be a perfect way to end a hectic season and playoff run.

In August, Hitchcock will team up with the coaching staff of the Roger Neilson Hockey Camp for a week of hockey instruction at the Canada Centre skating rink in Metulla. Joining him on the ice will be his two step-sons, Noah and Alex, while his wife, Nancy Bruce, who is Jewish, and their daughter Emily will also make the trip.

Ken Hitchcock

This will be the first-ever visit to the Holy Land for the Hitchcocks. The boys, in particular, are excited about the trip, with the two of them "hammering away on the Internet" doing research about the country, Hitchcock said.

Even in the NHL coaching and playing ranks, Israel and the Metulla hockey school are becoming more widely known. Hitchcock learned of the camp from Neilson two years ago.

"I talked to Roger about it and he said what a great experience it was," Hitchcock said. "It was always in the back of my mind."

About two months ago he contacted Marshall Starkman, one of the co-founders of the camp, and volunteered his services.

Film to document life of baseball giant

By MARK SMITH
Special to The CJN

NEW YORK — He was a Jew of epic proportions – 6-foot-4, powerful, handsome, courageous.

There was something biblical about his performance, like Samson battling the Philistines. Now, trade the jawbone of an ass for a baseball bat and you get Hank Greenberg, perhaps the most unsung hero of America's national pastime and a symbol of hope for a generation of Jews still fresh off the boats.

Hank Greenberg stood at 6-foot-4

The new, acclaimed documentary, The Life and Times of Hank Greenberg – written and directed by award-winning filmmaker Aviva Kempner – was screened at the Montreal Jewish film festival. And, for the first time in more than 50 years, Greenberg's remarkable achievements will be pitched back into the limelight.

The newspapers dubbed him "Hammerin' Hank," but to millions of Jews, the sad-eyed first baseman for the Detroit Tigers was "Hankus Pankus," the "Moses of baseball," the "Messiah."

Greenberg was born into an Orthodox family on New Year's Day, 1911. He was the product of a classic immigrant childhood – Yiddish-speaking parents and crowded Bronx tenements. Like every other Jewish kid, he was supposed to be a lawyer or a doctor. He signed a baseball deal because a scout promised Greenberg's Romanian father his boy would go to Princeton.

His career on the field was sensational. Greenberg spent 13 seasons with the Detroit Tigers, catapulting them to two World Series victories. He was twice named Most Valuable Player and was later named to the Hall of Fame. When he struck out, he looked goofy. But his home runs were majestic.

In 1937, he drove in 183 runs, one shy of Lou Gehrig's record. A year later, his 58 home runs were second to the 60 hit by Babe Ruth in 1927 – a record not broken until 1961. He was without question the greatest Jewish hitter of all time.

But The Life and Times of Hank Greenberg is more than a baseball movie. As Kempner's profoundly moving film shows, Greenberg used baseball to battle bigotry, and it was his achievements in the face of ignorance, anti-Semitic slurs and outright hatred that won him the love of almost every Jew in North America.

It may have been a first in 1996 when Toronto Blue Jays slugger Shawn Green turned around at home plate to wish two other Jews – Brewers catcher Jesse Levis and umpire Al Clark – a Happy Rosh Hashanah. But in the 1930s, a Jewish ball player was exotic, freakish, an anomaly.

Greenberg was a rookie Tiger in 1933 when Jo-Jo White, a teammate, kept staring at him. "Where's your horns?" White asked in apparent innocence.

Greenberg wrought his magic in the hometown of two of America's most notorious anti-Semites. The hate-literature of auto magnate Henry Ford and the radio rantings of Father Charles Coughlan made Detroit a hotbed of anti-Semitism in the '30s.

Everywhere he went, the stands and dugouts were filled with ethnic baiting. Until Jackie Robinson came along, no player endured so much abuse with so much dignity.

"It was a constant thing," Greenberg says in the film. "There was always some leather lung yelling at me. It was a spur to make me do better. I could never fall asleep on the field, because as soon as you struck out, you weren't only a bum, you were a Jewish bum."

During one game, he even had pork chops thrown at him. At the 1935 and 1945 World Series – both between the Tigers and the Cubs – slurs from the Chicago bench grew so voluminous, umpires had to intervene and order the Cubs to desist.

Fellow Hall of Famer Ted Williams, who attended the cinematic debut of Kempner's documentary at Manhattan's Film Forum in January, recalled another afternoon in New York when the Yankees players were going after Greenberg with particularly nasty enthusiasm. After the game, Greenberg followed the Yankees to their clubhouse. According to Williams, he stood before the rival team and said: "I heard what was said out there today. Whoever said it, if you got a gut in your body you'll stand up." Williams added: "You know who stood up? Nobody."

This was classic Greenberg. Every time he confronted anti-Semitism, he counteracted the popular notion that Jews were sinister, alien, conspiratorial and weak.

He was one of the few white ball players to welcome Jackie Robinson, whose rookie year, 1947, was Greenberg's last. More than any other player, Greenberg knew what it was like to be a target. After one collision at first base between the veteran Tiger and the first black major leaguer, Hammerin' Hank whispered into Robinson's ear. Asked later what Greenberg had told him, Robinson said: "He gave me a few words of encouragement." Rarely have few words meant so much.

Some versions of baseball folklore have it that other teams didn't want to see a Jew break Babe Ruth's great home run record, so they walked him or threw pitches that could never be home runs.

Greenberg refused to feel sorry for himself. "I wasn't bitter at all," he says in the film. "Fifty-eight, that's not a bad year."

Poverty, affordable housing on conference agenda

TORONTO — A day-long conference on May 8 will examine affordable housing and poverty in Toronto's Jewish community.

The conference is being organized by the Kehilla Residential Programme, UJA FEDERATION of Greater Toronto and other agencies.

Studies have shown that an inability to access affordable housing is a key predictor of homelessness, according to the Kehilla Residential Programme, which says it has witnessed an increasing problem in the Jewish community, and a sense of despair at five to 10-year-long waiting lists.

Recent studies show that 45 percent of renters are paying more than 30 percent of income on rent, while nearly a quarter of all tenants pay more than half of their incomes on rent, the program says.

It notes that close to 40 percent of Jewish households are unable to afford average rents in Toronto to within 30 percent of their incomes.

The problem is greatest for the most vulnerable members of the Jewish community: children who live in poverty (over 3,600 under age 18, not including York Region); victims of domestic violence who receive support from Jewish Family & Child Service and who are forced to stay at risk because they have no other place to go (about 430 cases); as well as the elderly on fixed incomes, and the disabled.

The Kehilla Residential Programme views the lack of affordable housing as a threat to Jewish continuity: "After paying for housing, there is little remaining to maintain a Jewish lifestyle. The problem of maintaining a Jewish lifestyle is even greater for middle-class families who are not likely to be eligible for the program subsidies and financial supplements available to lower income families."

A grand, bold moment

From the editor's desk

Virtually hidden away, indistinct from most of the modest dwellings surrounding it on Rothschild Boulevard in the heart of Tel Aviv, is the home of the city's first mayor, Meir Dizengoff. He and his wife Zina lived there for a number of years, entertaining dignitaries, friends, musicians and artists, fostering, through their generosity and encouragement, the development of a burgeoning, indigenous art in the young pioneering community. After his wife's death, in her name, Dizingoff donated the home to the city to become the official Tel Aviv museum.

On the afternoon of Friday May 14, 1948 (the fifth day of Iyar, 5708) shortly before 4 p.m, in a race against both the sun's casual descent into the western sky and the frenzied, hateful mobilizations into war of the surrounding countries, David Ben-Gurion stood in the main hall of Meir and Zina Dizengoff's former home and proclaimed the birth of the state of Israel. The photo inset into this column captures that grand, daring and audacious moment forever, a moment that shocked most of the world.

The West was generally unprepared and, one might add, even disbelieving of the bold re-entry by the Jews into the flow of modern history.

The Arabs of the neighbouring states were contemptuous of the Jews, as were their co-religionists who shared the mandatory borders with the Jews of the Yishuv. They were delighted at the opportunity to staunch that flow at the beginning of its hopeful new course. (It is now a forgotten footnote of history that in the days before 1948, the Arabs within the British mandatory rule were not known as Palestinians. Palestinian was the term reserved for the Jews.)

Even among the Jews of the world, there were skeptics and worse.

No one today born after May 1948 and especially after November 1938, can imagine how that moment seemed to turn the world upside down, setting it at last aright, bringing it out of darkness into light, out of endless night into awakening dawn.

For a few brief moments on that Friday afternoon the tears of Jews were shed in celebration, not in sorrow.

But only hours later, enemy planes buzzed overhead, and the guns blazed yet again in the hills and valleys of Eretz Yisrael.

Jewish freedom and sovereignty would be won, not by the assurances of world opinion, the pleasure of the super-powers or the sufferance of moderate Arabs, of whom, at the time, there were none, but by the right of Jews to return to their ancestral homeland, by force of arms and ultimately by the sacrifice of more than 6,000 lives of those who fought to ensure the newly proclaimed Jewish state would not be stillborn.

Fifty-two years later, the figure 6,000 has increased threefold to nearly 18,000.

Though no longer fighting for its survival in the same way, the state is still vying for security of place and position in the region. It has signed treaties of peace with two of its neighbours, is in the midst of difficult and frustrating negotiations with the Palestinian Arabs and hopeful of negotiations with Syria and Lebanon.

There are indeed strategic and tactical security dangers lurking for the Jewish state within the region, but the situation is far less precarious today than it was 52 years ago. Israel today is a remarkably dynamic, exciting, endearing, irritating, achieving, industrious, flourishing democracy, still the only democracy in the region.

Perhaps that is why so many of us seem to have either forgotten or simply stored farther back in the "filing cabinet" of our emotions the feeling of grandeur and daring of that bold moment that shocked most of the world on May 14, 1948.

But we should remind ourselves.

And we should certainly attempt to convey that feeling to our children.

The 48-hour period that commences this year after sundown on May 8 and ends at sundown on May 10 – Yom Hazikaron and Yom Ha'atzmaut – are the perfect occasions for doing so.

In that moment 52 years ago, history changed. As time unfolds, so too will the certainty of this truth.

"It was a day brought about by God; let us rejoice in it and celebrate it."

–MBD

Conference to examine affordable housing, poverty in community

The Kehilla program, founded in 1982, has over 3,000 families and individuals on its waiting lists for housing and only 260 units to offer in the Jewish community.

It says a community-wide plan is needed to respond to the issues. Several speakers will address the gathering. The keynote address will come from Anne Golden, chair of the Mayor's Homelessness Action Task Force.

The Kehilla Residential Programme developed four non-profit housing projects in Toronto between 1982 and 1995, and currently manages 360 units in four buildings. Its latest initiative, 2 Neptune Dr., is a 120-unit building for seniors, developed with the Baycrest Centre. It is expected to open in early 2001. For information on the conference, to take place at the North York Memorial Community Hall (5110 Yonge St.), dial 416-932-1212.

Yiddishland Café project brings music literature to community

TORONTO — The Workmen's Circle Yiddishland Café recently mounted an evening of song and music, recalling many aspects of Yiddish life, past and present.

The Yiddishland Café project was born several years ago as part of the cultural activities of the Workmen's Circle. Its mandate is to bring samples of Yiddish music and literature to the community, featuring local artists.

The recent evening's program consisted of well-known Yiddish songs, new and old. The performers included Miriam Eskin, Lenka Lichtenberg and Michael Mandel, and musicians Nina Shapilsky, Sasha Luminsky and Martin van de Ven.

The committee for Yiddish of UJA FEDERATION, which provided seed money for the project in its first year, has invited community organizations, synagogues, clubs and other institutions in Toronto to plan at least one program this year in honour of Yiddish, in Yiddish or English.

Applebaum was a leader in artistic community

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Louis Applebaum, prolific composer, arts maven and all-round cultural guru, died in Toronto April 20 following a long bout with cancer. He was 82.

Obituary

Applebaum was a kind of patriarch in the arts community, having played a leading role in the creation of a national arts infrastructure.

He wrote some 250 scores for the National Film Board, music for dozens of plays at the Stratford Festival, several fanfares, and earned an Academy Award nomination for his score for the 1945 Hollywood movie The Story of G.I. Joe.

His last major work was Erewhon, his only opera, co-written with Mavor Moore. It premiered in Victoria in February and was scheduled to air on CBC Radio 2 on April 29.

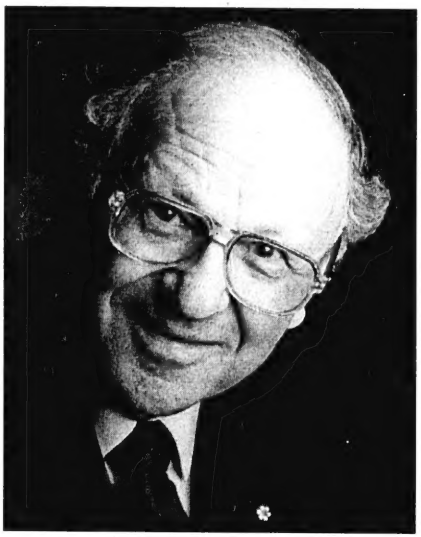
He was also a major force in the administration of the arts, having headed the Ontario Arts Council from 1971 to 1980. In 1979, he was appointed by then Prime Minister Joe Clark to co-chair a federal review of Canadian cultural policy. The Applebaum-Hébert Commission spent more than two years studying the arts and its funding. Some of its recommendations were implemented by the government of Brian Mulroney.

His earlier inquiries into arts funding resulted in the creation of the National Arts Centre Orchestra. He later chaired, for three years, the centre's music, opera and ballet committee.

Along the way, he wrote symphonies, hundreds of scores for television and film, and music for ballet.

Born in Toronto to Polish immigrants – his father, a tailor, founded the Bell Cloak Company, a coat maker – Applebaum began studying music at age 10 and composition five years later. He studied music at the University of Toronto and in New York. Beginning around this time – the early 1940s – until 1960, he penned scores for the National Film Board, where he served as musical director for a period.

Applebaum was a longtime member of Toronto's Temple Sinai. He wrote two choral pieces for the temple, The Last Words of David and Life is a Journey. The latter was performed by the Elmer Iseler Singers at the St. Lawrence Centre on the occasion of Applebaum's 80th birthday.



Louis Applebaum

A modest man, Applebaum serviced notice that he did not want a eulogy at his funeral. He said that Life is a Journey was an adequate summation of his life.

His request was honored at his funeral. His friend, Ben Steinberg, the temple's composer-in-residence and retired director of music, sang the 121st Psalm and the K'El Maleh Rachamim.

"He had an intense love of music and Judaism," Steinberg recalled for The CJN. "Music was his life, and he loved being part of his people."

When Steinberg founded the Jewish Music Society of Toronto more than a dozen years ago, Applebaum immediately agreed to serve on its committee, Steinberg said.

Applebaum was also involved in jurying the temple's annual Ben Steinberg Musical Legacy Award, given to a promising young Jewish artist.

"He was a Companion of the Order of Canada, but I and so many others in the shul mostly just knew him as 'Lou,' " remarked Rabbi Michael Dolgin, Temple Sinai's spiritual leader. "He was humble and always had time for everyone.

"He was the essence of being a mentsch."

Applebaum's record of accomplishments is dizzying.

In 1951, he founded the Canadian League of Composers with a handful of members to advance the interests and wellbeing of music writers.

He joined the Stratford Festival as founding head of its music wing in 1955 and wrote dozens of incidental scores, including the ones which summon patrons to their seats, and another signalling the start of the play. His fanfares included one for Expo '67 and two for royal tours of Canada.

He also wrote music for various CBC series and specials, including The National Dream in 1973.

Applebaum received a Juno Award for special achievement in 1995. He was awarded honorary degrees from York University and the University of Windsor.

He leaves his wife of 59 years, Janet (née Hershoff); son David, 55; three grandchildren; one great-grandchild; sister Ruth Nusyna of Toronto; and two nieces.

Religion, ethnic background on 2001 census

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Statistics Canada will ask Canadians about their religion and ethnic background on the 2001 census.

The agency confirmed last week that both questions will be on next year's headcount, as Canadian Jewish Congress had requested.

In January, Jewish community leaders wrote to Prime Minister Jean Chrétien, cabinet members and MPs, asking that the questions on religion and ethnic origins be retained on next year's census because they provide communal planners with invaluable data.

Omitting the questions would have constituted "a serious error," Congress president Moshe Ronen and United Israel Appeal Federations Canada president David Goldstein wrote.

Ronen was pleased that Ottawa will keep both questions, and stressed that respondents should not shy away from answering them.

"There's no obligation to answer them if people feel they are intrusive or personal, but they are such an important tool in community planning," Ronen said.

The question on religion will ask simply: "What is this person's religion?" Only one denomination may be specified.

The question on ethnic background will ask: "To which ethnic or cultural group(s) did this person's ancestor's belong?" Respondents are allowed to list up to four ethnic backgrounds, Jewish being one.

Statistics Canada has considered "Jewish" to be both religion and ethnicity for decades. No other ethnicity or religion falls into both definitions.

Censuses in years ending with one have asked about religion and ethnic background since 1901. Headcounts in years ending with six – so-called mini-censuses – inquire about ethnicity only.

The 1991 census found 318,000 Canadians who said their religion was Jewish, while 368,000 listed Jewish as among their ethnic origins.

In 1996, 351,000 respondents claimed to have Jewish ethnicity.

But communal planners rely on neither tally. They use a mix of both, derived by experts at McGill University in Montreal. The blend uses several variables, and excludes only those who claimed Jewish ethnic origins but professed another religion.

The numbers have traditionally provided community planners with a treasure trove of data on family status, income, education levels, languages spoken, mobility, and levels of assimilation.

In the past, Jewish academics have clashed on the meaning of the numbers, with some arguing that the presence of more "ethnic" Jews than "religious" ones reflects rising rates of assimilation.

Veiled transparently

The recent libel suit against Deborah Lipstadt by David Irving proved that although some individuals can be quite clever in their efforts to disparage and attack Jews, the transparency of the veil they put before the public is apparent for all to see and eventually falls away in any event, exposing the truer face of what was barely hidden.

Two weeks ago, on April 24, Easter Monday, the Globe and Mail published an article by John Lloyd entitled "Slaying the ghosts of Jewry's past;" in it the author argues that "today's anti-Semites...feed off behaviour by the state of Israel itself." The author cites an incident presently before Israel's Supreme Court of alleged discrimination against an Arab family as typical of the Israeli "behaviour" that feeds anti-Semitism. This behaviour, the author suggests, is endemic to Israel because it is endemic to Zionism and Zionism, after all, is at the very core of Israel's essence.

Logically, substantively and morally, Lloyd's argument is specious. In essence, he blames the victim for being victimized; he blames the person who is hated rather than the hater; he blames the sufferer of the disparagement rather than the disparager himself. History, both recent and ancient, has proven the absurdity of such an argument.

Then we see the veil.

Lloyd cavalierly throws out misleading statements as if they were truth: "In the present Labour government...there is an understanding that the state can no longer justify itself on the old basis." By "old basis" he clearly means Israel as a haven for Jews and for the ingathering of Jewish exiles. But no one in the government, despite the liberal tendencies of the Supreme Court of Yossi Beilin, whom Lloyd trumpets as being representative, has suggested this or anything like this.

And then he lets the veil drop.

Lloyd repeatedly and mischievously sets up a false, invidious dichotomy between Zionism and democracy: "nor can the Zionist cause take precedence over the demands of equal access and justice." Despite Lloyd's effort to create the contrary impression, there is no cleavage between Zionism and the demands of equal access and justice. Israel's societal imperfections are increasingly finding their repair in the legislative and judicial systems that are the cornerstones of its democracy in the same manner as societal imperfections do in all democracies around the world.

And finally, we see his truer face.

"Israel's need is to supersede its Zionist destiny" if it wishes to "deprive the anti-Semites of part of their platform." In other words, the author is effectively saying Israel must cease to be a state for the Jews if it wishes to mollify the haters of Jews.

Must Israeli Symphony play Wagner?

Recently, the Israel Symphony Orchestra decided to include music by the 19th-century German composer Richard Wagner in its repertoire. "The time is ripe to distinguish between art and ideology," said the director general of the orchestra, Ehud Gross, in justifying the decision.

But of course art is very intertwined with ideology, as anyone who has paid any attention to the various "culture wars" that have wracked societies from Communist Russia to present-day North America can attest to.

This is particularly true for Wagner, who made no secret of his deep and extremely virulent anti-Semitism, and in 1869 even published a polemic, Jewishness in Music, setting forth his views. Marc A. Weiner, in his book Richard Wagner and the Anti-Semitic Imagination (Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1995), demonstrates that anti-Semitism is at the very core of Wagner's operas — music as well as librettos.

For Wagner, Jews were the equivalent of deadly vermin. He was among the first of the so-called "modern," racial anti-Semites, those who in the 19th century created the ideological climate for that depersonalisation of Jews that would lead to Hitler's attempt to "cleanse" Europe of Jews, as if they were a disease upon the body politic.

Wagner was not just someone whose music Hitler found appealing; he was a precursor of Nazism. Is it really necessary for an orchestra in a Jewish state founded to a large extent by those who escaped such horrors to pay homage to someone like him?

A Birthright feeling

As a member of the first Canadian group to travel to Israel on the Birthright program, I would like to share a personal feeling.

I heard the stories of the Land of Israel as a child but I will never forget the opportunity given to me to see some of the actual sites. For example Masada left me with a feeling that I can't seem to explain. But I can say this: Masada will not fall again. The faith and beliefs of the Jewish people get stronger every day.

I left a part of myself in Israel that I know I will reclaim. I will go back when the time is right and again reclaim what is mine there. A little part of myself. It will not be hard to find it; it will be waiting for me when I get there.

Honouring Righteous Diplomats

Earlier this month, on April 3, a ceremony was held in the General Assembly hall of the UN in New York, to mark the opening of a new exhibit entitled Visas for Life: The Righteous Diplomats. The Visas for Life Foundation has identified, to date, more than 65 diplomats from 22 countries who, at great personal risk, rescued tens of thousands of Jews and other refugees from certain death during the Holocaust. A documentary for the History Channel, called Diplomats of the Damned, is currently being made.

Congregation Beth-El in the Town of Mount Royal is honoured to have been invited to host the exhibit's Canadian première as it soon begins a world tour of 25 cities. The pride we feel as participants in this educational and inspirational enterprise is somewhat eclipsed by the pitiful record of official Canadian government indifference during those years of inhumanity, darkness and tragedy.

The story of these righteous diplomats needs to be told. Coming from the most diverse backgrounds (China, Germany, Japan, the Holy See, Turkey, Poland, Brazil, Hungary, Italy, the United States, International Committee of the Red Cross, Portugal, Bulgaria, Argentina, El Salvador, Czechoslovakia), they often suffered severe consequences for their acts of great moral courage.

Stories of Baghdad life

I would like to draw the attention of those CJN readers who do not read Yiddish, to the fact that in the Yiddish Corner (CJN, April 6, 2000), the English title of Avner Meiri's book from which the story was taken is Waters of Babylon.

This is a slim volume of wonderful short stories of life in Baghdad around 50 years ago. Naim Katan, who was the head of writing and publishing for Canada Council wrote an introduction to this book.

The book can be purchased directly from the author. His address is 124 Mullholland Dr., Thornhill, Ont. L4J 7T9 or phone 905-771-0250.

Three Machal flyers remembered

By EDDY KAPLANSKY
Special to The CJN

In the War of Independence, almost 70 percent of the aircrew of the Israel Air Force was made up of overseas volunteers. Since most of them were from English speaking countries, English was the de-facto operational language of the IAF well into 1949.

In stark contrast with their 185 Israeli counterparts, most of the 416 Machal flyers had acquired considerable combat experience during World War II. Without them, the nascent IAF would not have been able to utilize its B-17 heavy bombers, its large transport planes or most of its fighter aircraft, as few Israelis were then qualified to fly such advanced planes.

Israelis were a minority in their own air force, because the Royal Air Force (RAF) did not accept Eretz Israelis for aircrew training until 1943 – almost four years into the war. Only about 25 Eretz Israelis had qualified as RAF pilots by the time the war ended, and fewer still had acquired other aircrew trades.

Thanks largely to the participation of the Machal flyers, the IAF was able to achieve mastery of the skies over Israel and accomplish the vital clandestine airlift of armaments and fighter planes from what was then Czechoslovakia.

Three late comrades-in-arms – two of whom were not Jewish – contributed much to the remarkable achievements of the IAF. Clifford Denzel "Denny" Wilson, "Red" Sturrey and Gordon Levett never boasted about their exploits, nor did they exaggerate their accomplishments. Their steadfast devotion to the cause was an inspiring example to their fellow Machalniks.

Denny, who was 79 when he died in Vancouver, was a native of Hamilton, Ont. One of 15 non-Jewish pilots from Canada to serve in the IAF during the War of Independence, he was with 101 Squadron, the IAF's only fighter squadron. Flying Mark IX Spitfires, Denny was especially active during Operation Horev – Dec. 22, 1948 to Jan. 7, 1949. He downed two Egyptian fighter planes on Dec. 31, 1948.

During World War II, Denny had served as a Spitfire pilot in the RCAF's 411 Squadron, which was part of the Second Tactical Air Force in Europe. He was credited with notable successes in raids on important enemy ground targets and with downing several enemy aircraft. The people of his home town proudly followed his exploits in the Hamilton Spectator.

When he returned home in the spring of 1949, the Hamilton Spectator carried a feature article on its front page with the headline: "Denny Wilson comes home from Israel." He was so popular in his city, he was mobilized to address fund-raising meetings for Israel. At one point, he was on a fund-raising tour with Allan Bronfman of the distilling conglomerate, Seagram and Sons.

Denny proved to be an effective and eloquent speaker. He was so involved in raising funds that he had little time to look for a permanent job. His personal charm and persuasive skills must have impressed Bronfman. When Seagram acquired Thomas Adams Distillers, Denny became its vice-president of marketing.

He remained a loyal and outspoken supporter of Israel throughout his life. His fellow 101 Squadron fighter pilots, among them, President Ezer Weizman, and indeed all IAF veterans who knew him, will fondly remember Denny not only as a skilled pilot, but as a warm and witty person with an ever-ready smile.

Benjamin "Red" Sturrey was 86 when he died in St. Paul, Minn., on Dec 4, 1999, not long after being diagnosed with pancreatic cancer. A native of Winnipeg, Ben was brought up in a traditional Jewish home and took a keen interest in Jewish studies. His family and friends were sure that he'd become a rabbi. But he turned down a grant that would have allowed him to study at Yeshiva University, to fight in the War of Independence.

Ben was promptly assigned to the IAF's Air Transport Command (ATC) when he arrived in Israel in May 1948. He participated in every phase of ATC's activities, mainly as a navigator on C-46 aircraft. He was deeply involved in the crucial Operation Balak airlift from Czechoslovakia, and in the Operation Dust airlift to Ruchama. He flew bombing raids during the Yoav and Hiram campaigns in October and during Operation Horev.

Gordon Levett
Red Sturrey
Denny Wilson

Ben was also on the crew of a C-46 piloted by Ted Applebaum and Blackie Bradshaw. They flew to Nieksic in the former Yugoslavia, in a plane bearing a freshly painted red star to conceal its identity. They returned with a Spitfire that had been damaged in landing. A week later, they shepherded two more Spitfires from Nieksic.

Ben and his fellow crew members had a dangerously close call on March 17, 1949, when their C-46 crashed and burned just after taking off from Avraham air-strip near present-day Eilat. After the crash, St. Patrick's Day was celebrated as a sort of second birthday by the four flyers.

Following his IAF discharge in late 1949, Ben flew with Alaska Airlines on the Operation Magic Carpet airlift from Aden that brought thousands of Yemenite Jews to Israel.

He acquired his air-navigation skills in the RCAF, and went on to fly 35 bombing missions with a Halifax squadron based in England. Most of the raids were against targets in the heavily protected Ruhr valley – which was commonly known as "Flak Alley" – a place where countless Allied bombers failed to return.

Those of us who had the good fortune to fly with "Red" remember him as a very competent navigator, who kept his cool under fire or in dangerous situations. His self-confidence and good humour was an inspiration to his fellow crew-members.

Gordon Robert Levett was born in London's working class Fulham district in 1921. He died on Jan. 4, 2000 in West Chiltington, England, after a bout with cancer.

Gordon was a staunch individualist with atheist and socialist views, who readily supported causes he considered just. He was greatly disturbed by the British Labour government's refusal to admit Holocaust survivors to Palestine after the war. A supporter of the UN Partition Plan for Palestine, he was appalled when Britain tried to foil its implementation. Although he wasn't Jewish, the ex-RAF pilot volunteered to serve the Zionist cause in April 1948.

Gordon proved to be one of the IAF's most versatile pilots, being equally adept at the controls of a C-46, then the world's largest twin-engine cargo aircraft, or in the cockpit of a fighter airplane engaged in a dog-fight. He was with ATC flying C-46 aircraft between Czechoslovakia and Israel until August 1948 when the Czechs forced an end to the vital airlift. For the next two months, Gordon actively participated in the airlift to Ruchama.

During the Yoav and Hiram campaigns, he flew bombing raids with "bomb-chuckers" in the crew. As the C-46 was strictly a cargo airplane, every C-46 crew included bomb-chuckers who manually heaved the bombs out of the airplane.

In November, he requested a transfer to 101 Squadron, after deciding that it was time he became a fighter pilot, his unfulfilled ambition of the Second World War. Gordon was soon checked-out on every aircraft type in the squadron; the Czech-built Me-109, the P-51 Mustang and the Spitfire. He was ready for action by the time Operation Horev began, downing two Egyptian fighter aircraft on Dec. 28.

In January 1949, Gordon was appointed commanding officer of 106 Squadron. He left the IAF in the summer of 1949 after the absorption of 106 into 103 Squadron.

Gordon joined the RAF in January 1939. He began as a trainee-mechanic. In July 1941, he got his wings and the rank of pilot officer. After completing a flying-instructors course he was sent to an air training base in Canada to train pilots in the Royal Navy Fleet Air Arm. After repeated requests for transfer to an operational squadron, he was posted to another base in Canada for a Dakota (DC-3) conversion course in 1944. He returned to Britain a few days after VE-Day.

There, he joined a Dakota squadron departing to the Far East. He flew one of the Dakotas on its 8,000-mile ferry-flight to India, but by the time he reached India, Japan had surrendered.

Gordon's remaining year in the RAF was not a happy one, because his socialist ideas and concern for the underdog conflicted with the views of his fellow officers.

His story is beautifully told in his autobiography Flying Under Two Flags, which was also published in Hebrew under the title Goy Shel Shabbat. It includes a foreword by Ezer Weizman, in which he wrote: "Although not Jewish, he [Gordon] believed with all his heart in the right of the Jewish people, particularly after the Holocaust, to a land of their own."

IAF members who knew Gordon will fondly remember him as a man of principle and a fine person. He was a real mentsch.

Eddy Kaplansky was an RCAF pilot in World War II. In 1947, he was a crew member on the Northland for the entirety of the ship's Aliyah Bet role. From June 1948 to September 1949 he served as a pilot in the IAF's Nos. 1, 103 and 106 squadrons and 35 Flight. He has been closely associated with the IAF Historical Branch since 1987. His e-mail address is: kaplansk@bezeqint.net

Being elderly in Israel

Readers of this column know that I have a special relationship to Ben-Gurion University of the Negev. Some years ago, a chair was established there bearing my name, and over these last decades, I have followed the steady progress that Israel's youngest university has made.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

The latest edition of BGU Now, the university's well-illustrated magazine-like publication has this to say about a new program.

"BGU's new master's program in gerontology is the first of its kind in Israel. The program is beginning with the first-year class of about 50 students and offers three separate tracks. The first, a research track, requires a thesis and leads to a degree in gerontology. The second, designed for clinicians who will work in institutions on specific projects, leads to a degree in geriatrics and offers an option for additional course work instead of a thesis. The third is business oriented, focusing on the organization and management of facilities for the elderly."

The head of the new program, Prof. Sara Carmel, recalls an experience she had while teaching a geriatric course to medical students, one that strengthened her developing interest in the problems of aging. The course included visits to social clubs and geriatric wards to interview the elderly about their life histories. At the beginning of the course, Carmel surveyed the students about their negative and positive stereotypes of the elderly. The negatives, she observed, included that old people smell, don't keep themselves clean, have trouble understanding and communicating, and talk too much. The positive stereotypes were fewer: Old people have interesting life histories, are grateful, and are more experienced.

One would expect that at the end of the professor's courses, the students would have changed their attitudes. But that was not the case. Even trained caregivers, she observes, are victims of stereotypes about the aged. The older the care provider is, the more he or she sees elderly persons in a stereotypical way.

That, of course, is not something unique to Israel. It is part of most industrial cultures. In fact, the more "primitive" the society, the better the elders are considered and the more lovingly are they treated. To be sure, we generally respect our elders, and raising funds for their well-being is an acknowledged priority of our communities, though on an individual level, things are different.

This is an area that is uncomfortable to deal with, but it is high time for us to face it — not only in Israel, but right here at home, where agisms and negative stereotypes about the elderly flourish without serious objections.

Who stood at Sinai

Several times in the past decade we have been privileged to hear Danny Siegel, poet, koch-leffel and tzedakah mayven. His constant themes have been the overriding responsibility of Jews for each other, and the need to recognize that all Jews stood at Sinai.

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

By the time this column is published, the seders will be concluded for this year, but we can reflect on how we fulfilled the mitzvah of inviting all who are hungry, all who are in need.

Hunger we can understand. Jews are a generous people with their gifts.

The need to be accepted – as one among the Jews who stood at Sinai – is a bit harder to comprehend.

Danny Siegel has written at length about the need to remember what kinds of Jews gathered in homes on the eve of the exodus, and 50 days later stood at the foot of the mountain to receive the Ten Commandments.

Who were these Jews? Here are some from Siegel's list and some he overlooked.

They were rich Jews, and poor Jews. They were Jews from Africa and Jews from the Baltic states. Jews from Moscow and Jews from Khazakstan. Jews from Minsk and Pinsk, and Jews from Jo-burg and Zimbabwe.

They were Jews who had a PhD and Jews who could barely read the aleph-bet. They were deaf Jews and blind Jews, lame Jews and athletic high-jumpers. Baseball stars and football players. Transvestite Jews were there.

They were Jews with mazel and luckless Jews who never would succeed. The Israeli mafia was there. Transgendered Jews were there. The hasidim and haredim were there, and so was Tommy Lapid and Meretz and the settlers from Hebron.

Jews with AIDS were there. Orthodox, Reform and Conservative Jews were there. Converts of the Orthodox, Conservative and Reform rabbis were there. Secular humanist Jews were there. United Jewish People's Order Jews were there and so were Republicans and Democrats from the United States.

They were Liberal, Conservative, NDP and Canadian Alliance Jews, and eastern and western Jews from Canada – Jews from Victoria and St. John's and Montreal.

Hackers and the electronically challenged.

Gay Jews and Lesbian Jews were there. The rabbis imagined the whole people of Israel, present and future, to be standing there in fear and high anticipation. And everybody got the message in a way they could understand.

This is such an overpowering midrash on the verses describing the entire nation gathered to hear the divine voice that every year I get chills just thinking about it.

There were no outcasts that day, nobody that you wouldn't want to sit next to in shul or in a bus, nobody that you would turn your face away from if they were in need.

Nobody that you would shun because their lifestyle was different, or they played music in their synagogue, or they wore 18th-century costumes of the Polish nobility, or covered their heads with elaborate wigs and snoods, or wore a minimum of clothing. Nobody who wasn't accepted as she or he came to the mountain, with all these differences and more that I can't think of.

The holiday for reminding us of this moment is actually not Passover, but Shavuot. So we still have a chance to rearrange our thinking about who should, and shouldn't be included. I was struck, then, by a full page advertisement published by Agudat Israel in the New York Times just before Passover, denouncing the recognition of gay couples.

If this judgment had been made, there would have been empty spaces at the foot of Sinai. If we start painting out all the people we don't want there, the crowd would diminish pretty quickly. Until there would be fewer and fewer, and pretty soon the divine voice would boom out over an empty desert.

And there would be no one to hear it.

Weizman's legal problem not uncommon

Arguably, two of the most powerful people in Israeli political/legal circles are Eliyakim Rubinstein and Edna Arbel. Who are these people, you ask? You've never heard of them?

Bruce Elman in Edmonton

In Israel, these individuals are household names, but outside of the state, they are largely unknown. Rubinstein is the attorney general and Arbel is state attorney and, at present, they have President Ezer Weizman, and former prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu under criminal investigation. Depending upon the results of these investigations, the careers of these men may be ruined or, in the case of Netanyahu – beyond reclamation.

Among other responsibilities, the attorney general is the head of public prosecutions. The attorney general is responsible for ensuring the maintenance of the rule of law and the integrity of the public interest. As a result of the high degree of professionalism and staunch political neutrality exhibited by those who have held the office over the years, the attorney general is held in high esteem by members of the general public as well as by the political and legal establishment.

Rubinstein is the latest in a long line of very independent attorneys general whose ranks have included Haim Cohn, Meir Shamgar, Aharon Barak, and Yitzchak Zamir – all of whom went on to serve on the Supreme Court of Israel.

The state attorney is the chief litigator for the state in all matters of a criminal, civil and administrative nature. Essentially, Arbel is the chief prosecutor and works closely with the police during their investigations.

These days, Rubinstein and Arbel spend most of their time deciding which political figures to indict and prosecute. As I write this column, Rubinstein and Arbel are scrutinizing the police report into allegations of tax evasion, bribe-taking, fraud, and breach of trust which have been levelled against Weizman.

The report found that, between 1987 and 1993, Weizman – a member of the Knesset, cabinet minister and president – illegally received gifts totalling approximately $455,000 from French millionaire industrialist Edouard Seroussi. Weizman disclosed none of these gifts to the state comptroller even though he had been required to do so.

The police report found no evidence of bribe-taking. The limitation period had expired on the charge of tax evasion. Similarly, even though there was evidence to support the charges of fraud and breach of trust, the time limitation on those charges had elapsed. The police recommended that no criminal charges be brought against the president.

Rubinstein and Arbel will now decide whether to accept the police recommendation. This was hardly a ringing endorsement of the president's integrity. Politicians of all political stripes are now calling for his resignation. It no longer seems to be matter of whether Weizman will leave the presidency, but rather when he will do so.

This case is extremely sad, but sadly not uncommon. Witness the six-year jail sentence on charges of bribery and corruption handed down to former Shas party leader Aryeh Deri. Presently, Likud Knesset member and former justice minister Tzachi Hanegbi will be prosecuted on charges of fraud and breach of trust. Unfortunately, there is more.

Earlier this year, the State Comptroller, Justice Eliezer Goldberg, turned over his report and supporting evidence on election finance violations to Rubinstein and Arbel.

The report cited massive election finance violations. Prime Minister Ehud Barak's party (One Israel) was singled out for the most scathing criticism in Goldberg's report. He then fined One Israel 13.8 million shekels, about $4.6 million (Cdn), for these violations. Other parties were fined as well, but those fines were minuscule in comparison that of One Israel.

Immediately upon receiving the report, Rubinstein and Arbel ordered a police investigation into the matter. Although five parties will be investigated, clearly attention will focus on Barak and whether he was involved in his party's violations of the Election Finance Law.

Israel is a democracy and the rule of law is one of the central values in any democratic society. It is premised upon the principle that the rulers or governors of a society are really the servants of the true sovereign – the people. Consequently, the governors cannot be above the law, but rather must be subject to the ordinary law of the land.

The widespread instances of unethical conduct by Israeli political leaders constitutes a clear breach of the rule of law and extends an unfortunate, but persistent pattern of behaviour which demonstrates a total disregard and disrespect for the people of Israel. This must stop.

Islamic fundamentalism in Egypt

The veil has made an astonishing comeback in Egypt, where women have fought hard for the right to unveil themselves, wear modern apparel and join the modern world. But "taking the veil" has become quite fashionable in recent years, and its reappearance coincides with the re-emergence of an Islamic revival movement and its radical offshoot, Islamic fundamentalism.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Walk down any street in, say, Cairo or Luxor, and you will see a sea of women covered from head to toe in enveloping black robes and veils. Women in western garb are on the defensive these days, and virtually the only ones who do not bother with veils are Christians, Jews (there are still a few left) and thoroughly westernized Muslims.

This was not the case on my first visit to Egypt in 1975, when veils were usually the preserve of the rural class and the urban poor. But with each of my subsequent visits – the last one having been in 1999 – the veil has become increasingly commonplace.

I harp on the veil because it is such a quintessential symbol of Islam, the religion that commands the allegiance of most Egyptians. Islamism, in and of itself, signifies a return to tradition and a reaction against Western culture and values. But when Islamism, a relatively benign form of religiosity, mutates into a political phenomenon known as Islamic fundamentalism, there is ample reason to be concerned. Islamic fundamentalism is ethnocentric, extreme, intolerant and all too often violent. And in Egypt, a key western ally and the first Arab state to make peace with Israel, militant Islam is in full cry.

From 1992 until quite recently, an Islamic fundamentalist rebellion brewed in Egypt, claiming the lives of scores of foreign travellers, government officials, writers and journalists. Responding to its brazen challenge, the authorities launched a concerted campaign against the militants, some of whom were trained and tested in Afghanistan during its struggle against a Soviet occupying army.

The crackdown, the overriding objective of which is to forestall the rise of an Islamic state governed by the Shari'a, or Islamic law, appears to have worked. In 1997, the year zealots gunned down 62 tourists in cold blood in the Valley of the Kings, the leadership of the Islamic Group, one of the main Islamic organizations at war with the government, agreed to a ceasefire. Several months ago, one of the leaders of Jihad, another Islamic group that has tried to overthrow the pro-Western regime of President Hosni Mubarak, urged his followers to lay down their arms and pursue their goals through peaceful means.

As Mary Anne Weaver observes in A Portrait of Egypt: A Journey Through the World of Militant Islam (Farrar, Straus and Giroux), the current Islamic revival in Egypt began after its defeat in the Six Day War. But the underlying reason why it has largely supplanted Arab nationalism as a unifying force is the squalid poverty afflicting millions of Egyptians. "People are suffering," she quotes Sheikh Omar Abdel-Rahman, an Islamic fundamentalist leader, as saying. An associate of Osama bin Laden, the Saudi terrorist, Rahman was the mastermind of the World Trade Centre bombing in Manhattan, and is now in prison in the United States.

And as Weaver – a staff writer for The New Yorker who has lived in Egypt – suggests, Islamic fundamentalism also owes its appeal to rampant corruption in the state bureaucracy, the rapprochement with Israel, the Islamic revolution in Iran, and the rise of a nouveau riche consumer society whose excesses mock the underachievements of the have-not populace. In 1977, this underclass ran amok in "bread riots," caused by a sharp and unconscionable cut in food subsidies.

But as important as these factors are in explaining the growth of Islamic fundamentalism, it is necessary to look back even farther.

Islamic revivalism in Egypt was born in the late 1920s, writes Weaver in this sober, knowing book. A schoolteacher, Hassan al-Banna, founded the Muslim Brotherhood to protest British colonial rule in Egypt. He was inspired in part by Rashid Rida, an Islamic reformer of the late 19th and early 20th centuries. During World War II, al-Banna was imprisoned for having contacted Nazi agents, but this taint did not deter two future presidents, Gamal Abdel Nasser and Anwar al-Sadat, from joining the Muslim Brotherhood.

Hosni Mubarak

When the first Arab-Israeli war broke out, it dispatched a company of commandos to fight on the Palestinian side. As its strength and influence widened, the monarchy panicked. Al-Banna was murdered, and thousands of his acolytes were banished to concentration camps in the Western Desert.

The Muslim Brotherhood regained its edge by siding with Nasser's republican Free Officers movement, whose objective was to depose King Farouk. However, the honeymoon was brief. The Muslim Brotherhood continued to agitate for an Islamic state, and when it was implicated in an attempt on Nasser's life, it was suppressed and outlawed, a ban yet to be lifted. (Indeed, Mubarak's government recently arrested 20 of its senior members after they tried to take over the Engineers' Union.)

Nasser's unlikely successor, Sadat, cultivated the Muslim Brotherhood so as to broaden his power base. Weaver claims that it became the strongest, best-organized political force outside his own well-oiled machine. Sadat, who also repressed the Muslim Brotherhood when it suited his purposes, feared the Nasserist left far more than Islamists.

The Muslim Brotherhood gained respectability by advocating a moderate brand of reform, by establishing a rival social/welfare network, and by gaining control of trade unions, student bodies and professional syndicates. But its success was tempered by the flow of some of its headstrong youthful members to radical organizations, notably the Islamic Group and Jihad (which assassinated Sadat in 1981).

By Weaver's estimate, the militant Islamic movement, though quiescent now, consists today of some 44 groups. Having attracted adherents from all social classes, it has infiltrated every major institution in Egypt: the clergy, public schools, universities, the armed forces and the foreign service.

In her view, some of the fiercest battles pitting Islamists against the government have unfolded in schools, particularly in Upper Egypt. She claims that the Islamists have basically seized control of the educational system, denigrating secularism, altering texts and playing inflammatory cassettes of "popular" sheikhs in classrooms. And, she adds, they have convinced the government to ban films deemed un-Islamic, and almost succeeded in reversing a ban on female circumcision.

Surveying the situation, Weaver comments, "One cannot escape the impression that the old multicultural, cosmopolitan, secular Egypt is slipping away."

Rightly or wrongly, Weaver blames Mubarak for the drift. Like his predecessors, he has veered between suppressing and coddling Islamists. But although he has been ruthless in confronting militant Islam, he has continued to condone Islamist influence. Weaver also ascribes its popularity to Mubarak's refusal to open the political arena completely and his constant infringement of human rights.

She is critical of the United States as well, claiming that Washington's "astonishing lack of balance in its dealings with Israel and the Arab world" has fortified the appeal of Islamic fundamentalists and their fellow travellers.

Yuval Vagner: Inner Strength

While Yuval Vagner (age 21), was training with his attack helicopter squadron his aircraft experienced severe vibrations, making it impossible to control. The helicopter crashed, tragically leaving Yuval a quadriplegic. Ironically, thirty years earlier, Yuval's father was left paralyzed in a command car accident.

Simple needs suddenly became extremely complicated. Eating by himself took long months in rehabilitation to achieve. Writing eventually became possible with the use of a special glove. Yuval found the need for constant help the most difficult part of his new reality.

Today, Yuval considers himself extremely lucky to be alive. Together with the incredible support at Beit Halochem, the strength of his parents, wife Yael, close friends and his own determination and inner strength, Yuval leads a productive life.

Yuval says that despite being quadriplegic, he appreciates every breath, good meal and happy occasion. More than anything, he appreciates all that Beit Halochem has done for him.

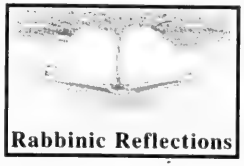
Breaking the cycle

By RABBI REUVEN TRADBURKS



Rabbinic Reflections

Just because everyone else is rotten does not mean we should be rotten too.

In the famous verse of "love your neighbour as yourself," we usually leave out the first half of the verse. The first half says, "Do not take revenge and do not bear a grudge against your neighbour, rather, love your neighbour as yourself, I am God."

The Talmud understands the revenge and the grudge being spoken of here as being related to the love your neighbour. Even when you are doing kindness, do not bear a grudge.

For example, if I go to my neighbour and the following conversation takes place:

Moishe: Chaim, can I borrow your shovel to work on my garden?

Chaim: No.

Next day, Chaim says: Moishe, can I borrow your hedge clippers to trim my hedge?

Moishe: Chaim, if you wouldn't let me borrow the shovel yesterday, then you don't get to borrow my hedge clippers today.

That is no good – that is revenge. Bearing a grudge would be the following:

Moishe: Chaim, can I borrow your shovel to work on my garden?

Chaim: No.

Next day, Chaim says: Moishe, can I borrow your hedge clippers to trim my hedge?

Moishe: Chaim, I am not rotten like you. Even though you are rotten and didn't give me the shovel yesterday, I am a nice guy, so you can borrow my hedge clippers today.

That is bearing a grudge.

Look at the beautiful standard the Torah creates – my kindness has nothing to do with the way you treat me. Just because you are rotten doesn't mean you will drag me down there with you. My kindness derives from the mitzvah and not from your standard.

Obviously, the normal revenge is forbidden. I cannot harm you, act against you, damage you in any way because of how you have treated me. I cannot be rotten to you. But who says I have to be nice to you?

Maybe, if you have been rotten to me you have lost the right to my kindness. I could just do nothing – nothing rotten, but nothing good either.

Therefore, the Torah says that when it comes to kindness, I must be kind to you, go out of my way to help you, ignoring the fact that you have been rotten to me in the past.

Now this is a very difficult level to reach – to treat all people with kindness regardless of how they have treated me. That is what the Torah demands. The Torah does not say "love your neighbour like yourself but only if he deserves it and is kind to you."

Could it be, that maybe, if I treat you well and with kindness, even though you have been rotten in the past, that you will see that the cycle of ill feeling can be broken? The only question is who will get there first and take the first step to break the cycle?

Israel: from sorrow to joy

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

On the 5th of Iyar (May 10 this year), Israel will celebrate its 52nd year of independence. Even if you can't make it to Jerusalem for the official celebrations, you can still join in the party thanks to the World Wide Web.

But before the Yom Ha'atzmaut festivities begin, Israel observes Yom Hazikaron, the day dedicated to the memory of those who have made the ultimate sacrifice for their country. At 11 a.m. on May 9, sirens throughout the country will wail to proclaim two minutes of silence for the country's fallen soldiers and for the civilians who have become victims of terror. The Orthodox Union provides a very good Yom Hazikaron page with links to appropriate readings for the day [http://www.ou.org/yerushalayim/yomhazikaron/].

One of the most impressive sites is the official Israeli government area dedicated to fallen soldiers [http://www.izkor.mod.gov.il/izkor12.htm].

There are photographs and biographies of the soldiers and the location of every known grave. The site is entirely in Hebrew, but even if you don't speak the language, it is a moving experience just to click through the endless names and photographs of the people who gave their lives for the country.

As the sun sets on Yom Hazikaron, the mood in Israel shifts from sorrow to joy as Yom Ha'atzmaut begins. Why not start the day with a rousing rendition of Hatikvah? You can listen to five versions of Hatikvah at the Israeli-Jewish Yiddish-Hebrew-Folk-Cultural Music Midi Free Library [http://members.aol.com/israelmidi/index.html#FOLK].

While you're listening, you can read a fascinating article about Israel's national anthem [http://merlion.singnet.com.sg/~ruthlee/tqvhmain.htm]. There's quite a bit of debate about the origins of the melody. Some trace it to The Moldau by Czech composer Bedrich Smetana (1824-1884). If you have the time and a fast connection, download Smetana's work and compare for yourself [http://artists.mp3s.com/artists/15/the_virtual_philharmonic_orchestra.html].

Israel's Foreign Affairs site has an explanation of some of the country's other national symbols, such as its flag and the menorah. In addition, you can read the full English text of Israel's Declaration of Independence. Or if you prefer, you can hear David Ben-Gurion read some of it to you in the original Hebrew [http://www.israel-mfa.gov.il/mfa/go.asp?MFAH00k90].

The first five decades of the state have been miraculous, but Rabbi Noah Weinberg suggests that instead of finding its own moral path, Israel has fallen in love with Western consumerism [http://aish.com/holidays/Israel_Independence_Day/holiday_page.asp].

Rabbi Weinberg argues that Israel has forgotten how to play a leadership role of "tikkun olam" – fixing the world – and that it is time to re-examine the reason for its existence.

For more thoughts about the religious role of the Jewish state, you can listen to 613.org [http://www.613.org/independence.html]. There, you'll hear lectures from such speakers as Rabbi Marvin Hier, dean of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre, and Rabbi Berel Wein, with a story about the last night of the British Mandate.

Birthdays are also a time to celebrate, so make sure you point your kids toward Dr. Nurit Reshef's 100 Years of Zionism/Israel's 50th Anniversary Web page [http://www.bus.ualberta.ca/yreshef/zionism/zionism.html]. The Edmonton educator's site both amuses and entertains, with plenty of Java-based games – everything from assembling the map of Israel on your screen to a Cities of Israel wordsearch game and a quiz about the leaders of Israel.

For still more Yom Ha'atzmaut links, take a look at Maven [http://www.maven.co.il/subjects.asp?S=129] and the Virtual Jerusalem site [http://www.vjholidays.com/independence].

And if you can't make it to Israel this year, you can still look in on the festivities. Aish HaTorah Yeshiva has installed a live camera focussed on the Western Wall [http://www.thewall.org/]. The camera refreshes every minute so you can follow the ebb and flow of the crowd at the Kotel. Watch long enough and who knows who you might run into.

Have a very happy Yom Ha'atzmaut.

Guide covers Judaism

Essential Judaism, A Complete Guide to Beliefs, Customs, and Rituals*, by George Robinson (Simon & Schuster Inc.)

This book has a strange history. Its author, a 46-year-old freelance film critic and radio journalist, became immersed in Jewish life about a decade ago after many years of unconcern. He joined a Reform congregation in the Washington Heights section of New York City and eventually became its president.

Books
Bernard Baskin

When he began to teach and lecture about Judaism he couldn't find a comprehensive introductory guide. Innumerable books were available, but they tended to be specialized, partisan or lacking in historical or theological perspective. Few offered hands-on practical information about how to recite familiar prayers, perform necessary mitzvot or share in everyday practices.

So he sat down and wrote the book he couldn't find. The result is impressive. Essential Judaism runs to 650 pages and covers a rich spectrum of topics: prayer and ritual, the holidays and life cycle, and a list of the 613 mitzvot that are found in the Torah. There are brief entries on the Jewish emphasis on ethics and justice, the origin and practice of the dietary laws, the place of sexuality in the Jewish tradition and an introduction to the Hebrew Scriptures, with a brief survey of each book.

The Talmud is not overlooked. There are examples of how the Mishnah and Gemarah interpret biblical texts – as well as an outline of the scope of rabbinic material, including the Midrash.

Especially noteworthy are lucid, concise essays on Jewish philosophers and theologians from Philo and Maimonides to Rosenzweig, Buber, Heschel and Levinas – with excerpts from their writings.

A section titled How Judaism Got Where It Is Today, deals with such subjects as the Enlightenment, Zionism, anti-Semitism, the Holocaust, and feminism. In a commendable non-partisan manner, Robinson outlines the history and major teachings of Orthodox, Conservative, Reform and Reconstructionist Judaism.

In a recent interview, the author commented on his return to Judaism after many years of apathy and indifference. "I was anything but atypical. I'm one ripple in what is turning into a real wave," he said.

"My greatest ambition for this book is that it contributes to people coming back to their Jewish heritage," he added.

In the book's introduction he writes, "If one person who reads this book chooses to follow my path back to Judaism and experiences the joy, serenity, intellectual challenge, and emotional satisfaction that I have received in the decade since I walked into that synagogue, then my labour has been worth it."

What this work does not deal with is Jewish art, music or literature. The author is quick to admit that his already giant volume couldn't include everything.

There is an up-to-date 20-page bibliography, a time line of major events in Jewish history, statistics on Jewish populations around the world and an appendix on How Do I Know It's Kosher – An Orthodox Union Kosher Primer.

Essential Judaism should be welcomed by all those seeking a comprehensive, authoritative compendium on Judaism. I have read it with admiration and recommend it for home and congregational libraries.

Kedma North American Conference an "I am Canadian" experience

By MOSHE LEHRER
Special to The CJN

"Canadia (that's not a typo) couldn't make it, but Montreal's here," one geographically challenged American screamed out, marking our arrival at Brandeis University.

The trip there had been somewhat uneventful, aside from an accidental 157 kilometre detour around Sherbrooke due to a missed exit, but we made pretty good time, considering.

Guest voice

On the last weekend of March 2000, Brandeis University, with its over 60 percent Jewish population, and BOO (Brandeis Orthodox Organization) hosted the first annual KEDMA North American conference, welcoming some 250 students from all over the United States as well as six "Igloo dwelling ambassadors from the ice-covered, moose infested state of Canada."

KEDMA, the international network of observant students, is the Orthodox partner of Hillel, and supports observant students on campus through a variety of inclusive educational and social action programs.

Over the course of the weekend, the students celebrated Shabbat together, learned Torah, planned future programs and showed the unity, strength and leadership of today's Jewish student population.

The conference also coincided with the Shabbat across North America program which had Jews across America celebrating Shabbat (hence the name) together. It was uplifting to know that as we said the kiddush, Jews all across this great landmass of ours were joining along, united.

During the dinner, I realized that the six Canadians were dominating the room. It didn't matter that there were 250 patriotic Americans in the hall, Montreal was running the scene.

We started the singing, we started the dancing – "You guys must be from Y.U." (Yeshiva University) one student remarked as we got into a heated chassidic niggun.

"No," we replied. "We're not from Y.U. We're from Canada."

"Oh, you mean Canadia."

I realized then and there that Canadians and Americans are different (and I'm not commenting on their inability to comprehend that Canada is not, in fact, tucked away somewhere near Mexico).

We should be proud. Maybe it's our Inuit upbringing, or our "seal blubber" diet, but something makes Canadian students more outgoing, more active, more proud to bask in their Judaism.

I'm basing this observation not only on this conference, but also on every experience I have ever had with Americans, which I admit may be somewhat limited.

The conference continued with great lectures by scholars, including Rabbi Yosef and Dr. Rivkah Blau, as well as a meditation seminar led by Barry Bender, KEDMA's U.S. director (Jewish Meditation's Motto: Don't just sit there…Do nothing).

After Shabbat we were treated to the music of Moshe Shur and guitarist C. Lanzbomm, the Jewish Carlos Santana.

Jews were bouncing up and down to the 45-minute jam sessions of such Carlebachian Jewish staples as Dovid Melech Yisrael and Ki Va Moed.

Students who care deeply about the Jewish people

Finally there was some spirit being shown amongst the Americans.

We have a theory about this – Brandeis is supposed to be a dry campus (Motto: Jews but no booze) but it's possible that some Americans may have moistened the campus somewhat, if for one night only.

I may have exaggerated slightly. The truth is that over the course of the conference, I saw 250 Jewish students who care deeply about the Jewish people.

Canadians and American Jewish students may have VERY different ways of showing their pride – but they both do. I saw tomorrow's leaders dancing there that night

Now zoom out: Thousands of Jews dancing together on other campuses across the country.

Zoom out just a bit more: Some 13 million Jews worldwide, dancing together. United as one Nation. The future looks bright.

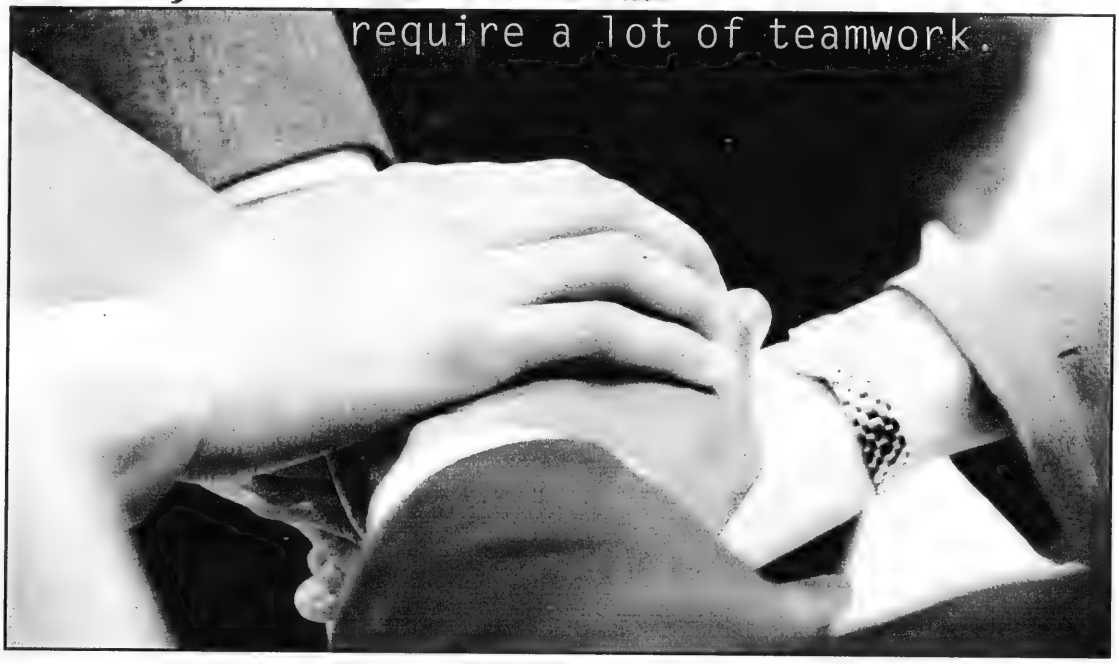
200,000 Dreams



As Jews, the value of working together is ingrained in our history. In fact, it's among the most important sources of our survival.

Jewish Toronto Tomorrow (JTT) symbolizes this spirit of unity. Every member of our community–nearly 200,000 strong–is a partner in JTT. We need donors, individuals with innovative ideas, organizations with dreams and, of course, volunteers to make them come true. Jewish Toronto Tomorrow is the way we can bring everyone together to meet our urgent needs.

We can already see the benefits of these powerful partnerships. The Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto–CHAT–is expanding its facilities to serve an unprecedented student population. A new centre for Jewish students at the University of Toronto will soon be built. We're working closely with She'arim Academy to provide more day school space for Jewish children with learning disabilities. Camp George offers a thriving Jewish environment for young summer participants. We've acquired 50 acres of land for a visionary array of community services in booming York Region. And dozens of organizations are contacting us weekly.

The dream of Jewish Toronto Tomorrow is a strong, vibrant and united community–not only for the Jews of Toronto, but for the entire Jewish people. Only when all of us work together in partnership, can we make this dream a reality.

Jewish Toronto Tomorrow–We're looking for dreamers.

To join us as a donor or a volunteer, call the JTT Hotline (416) 631-5828 or visit our website at www.jewishtorontotomorrow.net.

Rabbinical student wins leadership award

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Although Jill Borodin isn't sure exactly what she'll do when she finishes rabbinical school in 2001, she has no doubt that entering the program at the Jewish Theological Seminary (JTS) was the right decision for her.

The 28-year-old Toronto native decided as a high school student at University of Toronto Schools that she wanted to work within the Jewish community, but it wasn't until she was completing her bachelor's degree in Middle East and Jewish Studies at McGill University that the thought of entering the rabbinate even occurred to her.

Jill Borodin

"I realized it was the perfect fit," she said in an interview at her parents' home, while visiting from New York for Passover.

Next year, Borodin will become the fourth Canadian woman to be ordained at JTS since the Conservative institution began ordaining women in the mid-1980s. She is working on a master's degree in Jewish education concurrently.

But it's her extracurricular involvements that stood out most when she applied for a scholarship recognizing leadership and commitment to community.

"She's very accomplished. We feel she shows a great deal of promise for the future," said Adi Neuberger, a member of the award committee for the annual Stephen Cooper memorial scholarship given at Beth Tzedec Congregation by the Cooper family. Cooper died in 1988 at age 18. Borodin received the award last week.

In addition to her JTS studies, Borodin teaches youngsters in a Jewish after-school program, teaches Hebrew language and prayer to adults, is involved in helping coordinate a homeless shelter at a synagogue, and participates in a pluralism project with rabbinical students of other denominations at CLAL – The National Jewish Centre for Learning and Leadership.

She took a one-year hiatus from her studies last year to spend time in Romania serving its Jewish community as part of the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee's Jewish Service Corps, then volunteered on several projects in Toronto. She has also served as a rabbinic intern at a New Jersey congregation.

Finding time to pursue all her interests is a problem, she admits. "I really love what I do. I've succeeded in finding work that I've grown from, and that I find meaningful, so that drives me."

The product of what she describes as an observant Reform household, Borodin received her early Jewish education at Holy Blossom Temple, where her parents, Allan, a computer science professor, and Judy, a kindergarten teacher, are still members.

Her family is "very proud" of Jill, Judy said.

Borodin became more observant at age 16. When she is in town, she attends services at either the Narayever Congregation or at Beth Tzedec, where she co-taught a Talmud course with Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl last year.

"I love teaching," said Borodin. "I also know, for me, how much Judaism has provided an important framework for understanding the world and the meaning of life. I really love sharing this and helping people become empowered through becoming more comfortable and knowledgeable in their tradition."

Although she's interested in working with a congregation, at least in the short term, Borodin sees herself working in the realm of Jewish education on a long-term basis.

Borodin said the six-year rabbinic program, which is being extended over seven years in her case, doesn't feel like a long time. "It's very exciting. I love it. I love what I study. I love my community. I love the struggle to try and make sense of this and how to fit it into our life, the tension between being committed to the tradition and to a modern understanding of what the tradition means today."

Her experience in Romania taught Borodin how lucky she is to live in North America. Despite the cultural differences, Borodin felt she had much in common with the Romanian Jewish community of 12,000, because of the Jewish aspect.

"It made me more sensitive to how many groups we don't explicitly welcome into our Jewish community. We cater very much to the upper middle class. We don't always forget [about others], but there are many Jews in poverty and many who are much more disenfranchised."

She realizes now the importance of addressing both material and spiritual needs.

"I guess what I want to do is help people fall in love with their Judaism."

Girls dance 'as never before' in competition

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Three Jewish girls were among the only group of Canadian ballet students to take part in the finals of a new international dance competition.

Sarah Clark, 12, Rachel Lieberman, 14, and Leia Saltzman, 13, along with nine fellow students from the Academy of Ballet & Jazz, took part in the Youth Grand Prix USA, held at New York's Tribeca Performing Arts Center, in early April. Their teacher, Nadia Veselova Tencer, founder and artistic director of their school, was a judge at the event.

It was very exciting to compete with the best ballet schools, said Veselova Tencer. Among the other schools were the American Ballet Theater, Boston Ballet, Kirov Ballet and San Francisco Ballet.

The three girls, all at the intermediate/advanced level in ballet, competed in four dances each. They brought back a bronze award for Carmen, a six-person classical contemporary ballet choreographed by Veselova Tencer.

"They all danced as I never saw them dance before," she said. "They were really on a high."

The girls aspire to dancing careers and dance about 15 hours a week, juggling schoolwork and other extracurricular activities. Clark, a Grade 7 student, takes art and piano lessons, and is preparing for her bat mitzvah.

Lieberman, a Grade 9 student, also studies piano; and home-schooled eighth-grader Saltzman (daughter of Adath Israel Congregation's Rabbi Steven Saltzman) studies piano and voice as well. The two girls spent time in New York last summer studying at the Joffrey Ballet School.

"They have to be very focused and disciplined [in dance], and they apply that to school," said Margie Lieberman, Rachel's mother.

Leia's mother Shula Saltzman, who teaches modern dance at the Academy, kids that Leia started dancing before she was born.

In fact, the girls have all been taking dance lessons since age three or four.

"There's a lot of people who are very talented, and you have to work very hard to be what you want to be," said Leia, who enjoys dance as a way of expressing herself. "Everything [else] just disappears."

Mothers respond to Matti Baranovski killing

Pair creates anti-violence stationery

By SIMONE JOSEPH
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The November beating death of North York teen Matti Baranovski hit Maya Gold hard.

"Nothing in my life has affected me the way this murder did," Gold said.

Previous to Baranovski's death, Gold and business partner Sandra Silberzweig spoke about the frightening subject of youth violence. They were particularly concerned about a recent rash of school shootings across North America.

"We would be saying how scared we are for our children," she said.

But it was Baranovski's murder that profoundly impacted Gold. She said the murder touched her for a few reasons – she and Baranovski both come from Russian backgrounds and as the mother of two young children, she felt a mother's anguish.

"I was devastated from a mother's point of view," she said.

Keep Achieving* by Sandra Silberzweig from The Whimzy Line of stationery.

Also, for Gold, the killing happened very close to home. She was raised in the Bathurst Street and Steeles Avenue area, close to G. Ross Lord Park where 15-year-old Baranovski was killed.

"I grew up in this area – he was killed in a park where I used to play," she said.

When Gold approached Baranovski's aunt and said she wanted to help the cause of violence prevention, the woman directed her to a non-profit charitable organization called L.O.V.E. (Leave Out ViolencE).

Gold and Silberzweig had designed a new line of gift and stationery products for Gold's firm, artz-axentz.com, an art and home accessories company. After finding out about L.O.V.E., they decided that part of the proceeds from this new line would be donated to the organization.

L.O.V.E. runs programs for teens who have been touched by violence, either having witnessed, been victim to, or perpetrated violence. After being trained, these teens educate others in the community about violence prevention.

Gold and Silberzweig's new line of stationery, called The Whimzy Line for its "whimsy nature," is bold and cheerful with bright hues of pinks and purples and uplifting messages such as "achieve success and balance" or "keep dreaming".

A sticker on the back of each product reads: "Our youth are the future. Let's break the cycle of violence and teach them LOVE."

Although the pair have not yet finalized the amount they will be donating to L.O.V.E., Gold estimates it will be between five and 10 percent of profits.

For September, Gold plans on taking the company's line of mini prints, personal journals and cards to as many Toronto-area schools as possible for use in fund-raisers.

Gold hopes that by getting her products into schools, L.O.V.E. will also make contacts and will be allowed to give presentations and hand out brochures to students.

American Jews kvelled at Greenberg's success

The opening strains of the film's soundtrack – a Yiddish version of Take Me Out To The Ballpark – show how central baseball has been to the Jewish experience in America. But it's love that makes Kempner's creation so extraordinary.

Her documentary is a rich patchwork of archival footage, interviews with fans – among them, actor Walter Matthau – sportscasters and Greenberg's family. When these people remember Greenberg, it is clear they are reflecting on something that far transcends his athletic performance.

Harvard law professor, Alan Dershowitz, says: "He was what they said we could never be."

To Matthau, Greenberg was proof that a young Jew from New York didn't have to become a cutter or salesman in the Garment District. "He was part of my dreams. I wanted to be Hank Greenberg, I suppose, and I couldn't be Hank Greenberg. So I kvelled instead."

Michigan Senator Carl Levin says in the film: "Greenberg validated that this was the land of opportunity. Look, we could even play baseball!"

Rabbi Max Tichtin says: "I had this Captain Marvel – Hank Greenberg – on my shoulder. He was my big brother, my cousin, my mishpochah. He fought my battles in his absence. If a kid's bigger than you are, that's okay; if you're a Jewish kid, you've got Hank Greenberg on your side."

Greenberg wasn't the first Jewish ballplayer. But he was the first to keep his name. Michael Silverman became Baker. Rosenblum became Bennett. Cooney, Ewing, Kane and Corey were all Cohens in the off-season. Greenberg, however, was Greenberg.

Kempner said: "At the height of domestic anti-Semitism and the Nazis overrunning Europe, here was a Jewish ball player so good and so powerful. Two months after Hank nearly broke Ruth's record, Kristallnacht happened in Germany."

Years later, Greenberg said: "By 1938, if I, as a Jew, hit a home run, I felt I was hitting one against Hitler."

Kempner discovered Greenberg through her father, Harold, who left Lithuania for Pittsburgh in 1925 and later settled in Detroit. To Harold Kempner, baseball was a ritual of American assimilation and Greenberg was its symbol.

In September 1934, Greenberg considered not playing a crucial game during the league championship because it fell on Rosh Hashanah. Greenberg, and later a gaggle of Tiger fans, consulted a local rabbi, who found a convenient Talmudic interpretation, allowing Greenberg to play. The front-page headline of the Detroit Free Press read: "Talmud Clears Greenberg for Holiday Play."

Greenberg hit two home runs in that game for a 2-1 victory over the Chicago White Sox. The next day, the newspapers saluted him in Hebrew letters across its front page: "And so to you, Mr. Greenberg, Tiger fans say, "Leshano tovo tikosayvu!" Henry Ford and Father Coughlan must have choked on their coffee that morning.

Tigers manager Mickey Cochran warned his players: "Fellas, lock yourselves in your rooms tonight, because the Jews in Detroit are going crazy."

Hank Greenberg, however, did not play on Yom Kippur that year. Kempner's father was in Detroit's Shaarey Zedek synagogue when Greenberg walked in. His presence there moved the congregants to a standing ovation as four rabbis prayed.

"Six-feet-four!" recalls another fan in the documentary. "My God, nobody had ever seen a Jew that big. Everybody was 5-foot-5, 5-foot-6."

And so each year, while breaking the fast at Yom Kippur, Kempner listened to her immigrant father recount the story. "I thought Hank Greenberg was part of the Kol Nidre liturgy," said Kempner, now 53.

Kempner's father died in 1976 and Greenberg died of cancer 10 years later, the day before the opening of her first film, The Partisans of Vilna, a documentary about Jewish resistance to the Nazis in the Lithuanian capital.

For Kempner, documenting the life of a Jewish baseball player and chronicling Jewish partisans are not that far apart. "With Partisans," she said, "I tried to figure out the unanswered question, Why didn't Jews resist?, which was totally wrong. It should have been: How could they resist? With Hank Greenberg, I wanted to counter another stereotype – that Jewish men were nebbishes. There was another image, and for my ethnic background it was Hank."

The Life and Times of Hank Greenberg was 13 years in the making. But for Kempner, it was a labour of love. A life-sized image of Hankus Pankus hangs in her home in Washington D.C. And what she has created is a beautiful valentine to the hero who lit up her father's life.

"Many a night, I'd turn down the lights," she said. "I'd look at Hank and say, I'm going to do it. Then I'd pray to my dad. I know he's up in heaven now, kvelling with Greenberg, saying, " 'You know, Hank, we got your story told.' "

Candy is dandy....

By EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

Fudge should be stored in an airtight container, preferably between layers of waxed paper. You can double the recipes, but make sure that the ingredient amounts are exact. Too much of one or another ingredient can be a recipe for disaster.

CREAM CHEESE FUDGE

8 oz. cream cheese, softened
4 cups sifted powdered sugar
4 oz. baking chocolate (unsweetened, melted)
Dash salt
½ cup chopped nuts
1 tbsp. vanilla

Using a mixer, beat the cream cheese until soft and then gradually add the powdered sugar and mix well. Add chocolate, salt, nuts and vanilla. Mix well. Pour the mixture into a buttered 8-inch pan. Chill several hours and cut into small squares. Makes 20 to 24 pieces.

DARK CHOCOLATE MINT FUDGE

6 oz. bittersweet (not unsweetened) or semisweet chocolate chopped
¼ cup marshmallow creme
1½ oz. unsweetened chocolate, chopped
½ tsp. peppermint extract
1½ cups sugar
¾ cup sweetened condensed milk
½ cup water
½ cup whipping cream
¼ cup (½ stick) unsalted butter, cut into pieces

Line a 9x5-inch loaf pan with foil, overlapping sides. Place first 4 ingredients in metal bowl and set aside. Mix sugar, milk, water, cream and butter in heavy 3-qt. saucepan. Stir over medium-low heat until the sugar dissolves. Brush down sugar crystals from sides of pan using pastry brush dipped into water. Increase heat to high; bring to rolling boil. Reduce heat to medium-high; stir slowly with wooden spoon until clip-on candy thermometer registers 232. (about 9 minutes). Pour the boiling mixture over ingredients in bowl; do not scrape the pan. Stir the mixture in the bowl vigorously with wooden spoon until chocolate melts and fudge thickens slightly, about 2 minutes (mixture should still be very soft and glossy). Immediately pour fudge into prepared pan; smooth top with rubber spatula. Refrigerate fudge until firm enough to cut, about 2 hours. Lift fudge from pan, using foil as aid. Fold down foil sides. Trim ends of fudge. Cut into 24 pieces. (Can be made 1 week ahead. Chill in airtight container. Serve at room temperature.) Makes 2 dozen pieces.

CARMEL FUDGE

2 cups white granulated sugar
1½ cups heavy whipping cream
1½ cups dark Karo syrup
1 cup butter
1 tsp. vanilla
5 squares semisweet chocolate
2 cups chopped nuts (we prefer walnuts)

Butter a 9X13 cake pan and set aside. In large, heavy pan melt together the sugar, cream, Karo syrup and butter. Bring this mixture to a boil and boil until it reaches exactly 250 degrees on a candy thermome-

BAGELS

Bagels are Jewish Always have been Created in the Pale of Settlement
Long ago

When brought here, shunned by others
From an alien culture — controversial too: not knowing what they were missing

But Jewish bakers prepared them
Daily. Sundays, simchahs
Plain and traditional poppy seed to spread with cream cheese and lox

Soon adding raisins, cinnamon, sesame, all the extra tastes of the new world
Still shunned by others: not knowing what they were missing

Then came the '80s
Even regulars discovered them now
Shaped liked donuts but much more, nutrition, flavour, sophistication a history brings; unique delicacy, symbol of a culture

Suddenly others had to have bagels too
Realizing what they had missed, reaching for baggles, bugles or other misnomers

Even poor copies baked by beginners in obscure places with odd-sounding brands
— Happy Bagel, All American, Sunshine Questioning their dignity with ham and mayo
to go. Magen Davids nowhere to be seen

Now bagels adopted by most Often believing them their own
Breakfast without may not be complete
Researchers study, laud discovery of the remote genuine source

ter. Take this mixture off the stove and add the chocolate and vanilla. Stirs until the chocolate is melted and then add the nuts. Pour this mixture into the buttered 9x13 cake pan. Cool in the refrigerator. This candy needs to be kept in the refrigerator as it gets too soft at room temperature.

WHITE CHOCOLATE FUDGE

1 (8-oz.) package cream cheese, softened
4 cups powdered sugar
1½ tsp. vanilla
12 oz. white chocolate, melted
1½ cups pecans (or walnuts or macadamia nuts)

Beat cream cheese, sugar and vanilla in large mixing bowl at medium speed with electric mixer until well blended. Gradually add chocolate; mix well. Stir in nuts. Spread in greased 8-inch square pan. Chill several hours.

Note: you can use ¼ cup nuts and ¼ cup dried apricots or other dried fruit.

CREAMY KAHLUA FUDGE

1½ cup granulated sugar
1 7-oz. jar marshmallow creme
⅔ cup evaporated milk
¼ cup butter
¼ cup Kahlua
¼ tsp. salt
2 cups semi-sweet chocolate pieces
1 cup milk chocolate pieces
½ cup chopped nuts
1 tsp. vanilla

Line 8-in. square baking pan with foil. In 2-qt. saucepan, combine sugar, marshmallow creme, milk, butter, Kahlua and salt. Bring to a rapid boil, stirring constantly for 5 min. Remove from heat; add all the chocolate. Stir until melted. Add the nuts and vanilla and mix well. Turn into pan. Refrigerate until firm. Cut in squares. Makes approximately 2 to 3 lbs.

AMAZING FUDGE (VANILLA)

2 sticks (½ cup each) butter
¼ tsp. salt
2-lb. package confectioner's sugar, sifted
1 tbsp. vanilla
Scant ¼ cup canned milk or real cream

In a large saucepan melt the butter over lowest heat. Stir in salt and slightly less than ½ of the package of sugar. Stir until very smooth (some butter will still be on top.) Still over lowest heat, stir in milk and vanilla until smooth. Stir in remaining sugar and stir for 5 minutes, still over lowest heat. Turn into greased 9x13 pan. When firm, cut into small squares. Makes 3 lbs. of fudge.

PEANUT BUTTER FUDGE

4 cups granulated sugar
1 cup milk
¼ cup light corn syrup
Pinch salt
1 pint (16-oz.) peanut butter (creamy or crunchy)
1 tsp. vanilla

Combine the sugar, milk, corn syrup and salt in heavy saucepan. Bring to a boil and boil for 5 minutes. Remove from heat. Add the peanut butter and mix well. Bring to a boil and boil 3 minutes. Remove from heat. Add vanilla and beat until stiff and spread into buttered 9x9 pan. Cool and cut into squares. Makes about 1 lb.

FAST CHOCOLATE PECAN FUDGE

½ cup butter or margarine
¾ cup cocoa
4 cups confectioners' sugar
1 tsp. vanilla extract
⅔ cup evaporated milk
1 cup pecan pieces

Line square pan, 8x8x2 inches, with foil; set aside. In medium microwave-proof bowl, microwave butter on high (full power) 1 to 1½ minutes or until melted. Add cocoa; stir until smooth. Stir in confectioners' sugar and vanilla; blend well (mixture will be dry and crumbly). Stir in evaporated milk.

Microwave on high 1 minute; stir. Microwave an additional minute or until mixture is hot. Beat with wooden spoon until smooth; add pecan pieces. Pour into prepared pan. Cover; chill until firm. Cut into small squares. Store covered in refrigerator. Makes about 4 dozen squares.

What else is New FOR SENIORS

Buying a suite at Two Neptune Drive is a great way for children to show an aging parent they care.

This extraordinary senior's residence is close to the many facilities at Baycrest Centre, and offers a community of well-appointed, spacious suites ranging in size from 1 bedroom to 2 bedrooms and a den. Each suite is specially designed with numerous features to enhance the lives of independently-minded seniors – things like easy-to-reach power outlets, wider doorways, larger bathrooms and more accessible kitchen cabinets. There's 24-hour emergency response and the option of additional support services if that ever becomes important. Truly, the time is now to give your parents the best of senior's living in the heart of the Jewish Community. But hurry, Two Neptune Drive is already over 60% sold out.

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The Université du Québec à Montréal (UQAM) has ended its agreement with the Torah and Vocational Institute (TAV) after one year.

UQAM declared that TAV has failed to require that students take enough French and that the segregation of students along religious, ethnic and gender lines is not in the spirit of the university's mission.

The decision was made by the UQAM senate after the professors' union filed grievances in February that too many of the courses are in English, as well as objecting to having separate men's and women's classes for TAV's 170 chassidic students, taught by professors of the same sex. The courses are taught and co-ordinated by UQAM staff.

UQAM said no new students will be admitted, but it will honour its obligation to students already enrolled in the three-year program, which leads to a bachelor's degree in computer science or business administration. However, UQAM indicated it will not teach gender-segregated classes anymore because that was not part of the contract signed between TAV and UQAM in April, 1999.

"The decision to not pursue the program was necessary when it became obvious that it was not responding adequately to the different needs of the three clienteles that are enrolled there," UQAM said in a press release. These groups are described as the Chassidim, immigrants, largely of Chinese origin, and francophone North Africans. No explanation is given of what that means.

UQAM does say that its experience with TAV has led to "deeper reflection" on "the necessary integration of allophone immigrants into university life and, in a more general way, on the openness to minority groups in society."

TAV academic director Eli Meroz, who has led a very public campaign to try to save the program, was saddened by the news. It, effectively, means the chassidic sector will cease to exist after this semester, he said. "They are not going to bend on their principles," he said of these students.

Since September, about 100 chassidic men and 70 women, have been studying at TAV's Outremont campus. The other approximately 380 students, attend the main TAV campus on Décarie Boulevard.

"This is all very unfortunate," Meroz said. "UQAM is making a tremendous PR blunder that is sending a negative message to the students and society in general."

UQAM says the segragated classes were an "accommodation" but would be "difficult to maintain given the principles, orientations and policies that govern the university."

"Granted the segregated classes is not written into the contract, but what is written is that UQAM would endeavour to meet the needs of the chassidic community, and its limited access to higher education in the past has been precisely due to this reason. Separate classes might not be in the letter of the contract, but cancelling them is not honest to the spirit," Meroz said.

Meroz feels it is unfair to judge the program's willingness to increase French and promote the diverse students' integration into Quebec society after only one year.

"Cancelling the program is certainly not going to help integrate minorities," said Meroz, who points out that the Chassidim and many of the other students were learning more French and gaining more exposure to Quebec francophone society through this program than they would otherwise.

UQAM and TAV have different interpretations of what their agreement was on the amount of French to be taught. UQAM says that it had "foreseen" that 20 to 30 percent of the classes would be French.

"The contract says 'at least' 10 percent of the classes would be in French. They may have hoped that would mean 20 to 30 percent, but it doesn't say that. Students were from the beginning required to take a minimum of three French classes, and we brought that up to five," Meroz said.

Meroz points out that UQAM's mission statement includes this: "UQAM exists to train succeeding generations and people already in the workforce to make the latest knowledge available to all social and cultural sectors and to serve the community by responding to its expressed needs... It fulfils its mission and involves staff expertise and student participation through partnerships with the community to develop new fields of training, research and creative endeavour..."

"I'd say they are not being true to that," he said.

Meroz said TAV is considering taking legal action against UQAM because the agreement was that six months' notice would be given before cancelling the program.

"I interpret that as meaning six months before the end of the three-year contract, but even if it means they can do it anytime, the effect of what they are doing now is immediately terminating the program, with no forewarning," he said.

TAV will also try to find another partner, perhaps again approaching Concordia University, which earlier was not interested, he added.

TAV has received sympathy from the B'nai Brith Canada League for Human Rights. "The existing relationship between TAV and UQAM sent an extremely positive message of rapprochement between the Jewish community and the Quebec francophone population," said chair Allan Adel. "Cancellation of this program represents a major step backward in relations between the communities."

Legal committee chair Steve Slimovitch added: "Forcing Chassidim of opposite sexes to study together, in complete violation of their religious beliefs, encroaches on their freedom of religion, and runs counter to the Canadian and Quebec charters of rights."

Goodwill gesture goes sour at UWO

By DAVID SKOK
Special to The CJN

LONDON — What began as a goodwill gesture ended up leaving a bitter impression and unanswered questions for many in the University of Western Ontario's Jewish community.

Several hundred students who had paid in advance for a recent Alpha Epsilon Pi (AEPi) fraternity party were turned away at the door because of overcrowding.

In compensation to those who were not allowed in, AEPi, the only officially recognized Jewish Fraternity on campus, decided to donate all the proceeds to the Jewish National Fund.

This donation was announced the following Thursday in the Gazette, the university's daily student newspaper. The paper received an angry letter to the editor about the donation from two engineering students. The letter was published on April 4, but, it was later found out, the two had not signed their own names.

In the letter, the students wrote about being made to feel unwelcome by the University of Western Ontario's Jewish Community. The letter begins:

"Four years ago, we made the fateful decision to attend Western, believing it to be a diverse community in which each student could pursue their education in an environment without segregation. It took little time, however, before we realized there were many events or cliques at which we were not made to feel welcome, solely because we were not of the Jewish faith."

As an example, the students wrote that soon after coming to Western, they expressed an interest in learning more about Yom Kippur.

"We were quickly informed that unless we could say a prayer in Hebrew, we could not take part in witnessing the celebration," they wrote.

In one paragraph, the students angrily responded to AEPi's donation to the JNF.

"Why, when apologizing for an unfortunate incident at a party open to all Western students, did they decide to make a donation to the Jewish National Fund? What about all the worthy causes in our own country? Is planting a tree in Israel more important than feeding a hungry person in Ontario? It certainly isn't to us. Perhaps what you should be apologizing for is assuming that everyone who attended your party shared all your warped priorities," they wrote.

"We received 40 e-mails and 15 written letters in the first eight hours after the letter was published," said Aaron Wherry, the Opinions editor of the Gazette.

In an effort to ease the concern over the letter, the Gazette, which normally reserves space for only one or two responses, printed 10 of the responses in the following three issues of the paper.

When asked why the letter was published without a background check on its authors, Gazette staff were unwilling to comment. They said that although the letter was published in the paper, it reflected only the views of those who wrote it.

Responding to the letter's claim that AEPi has "warped priorities," Eric Bernofsky, president of AEPi at Western said, "It is unfortunate that the one time we actually make an effort to publicize our charitable donation, it happens to be for a Jewish cause."

Bernofsky wrote in a formal letter published in the Gazette the following day: "We are known on campus as a non-religious philanthropic fraternity. Rock for Research, an annual cancer research event, and the serving of food at a local London shelter are but a few of our worthy causes."

Mark Driman, vice-president of community relations for the Jewish Students Union at Western, and Joshua Landy, vice-president of communication for the JSU, co-wrote in the Gazette on April 7: "It seems the spirit in which the letter was written was not one of cultural tolerance. The stereotypes they suggest are misleading generalizations, and we believe that the attitude they maintain borders on racial prejudice."

Eitan Szlak, a first-year business administration student also wrote a letter to the Gazette: "I was really shocked and disturbed that some students at this university could actually take the time and effort to write such a derogatory letter. I am really proud, however, at the way the entire community rallied around this cause."

The Gazette's last issue of the academic year was published on Friday, April 7, the same week that the letter was printed. As a result, this debate may not be resolved before the summer break.

David Skok is a third-year political science student at the University of Western Ontario.

How religion may play politically

Although most of you were busy preparing for Passover (or watching the NHL playoffs!) you may have caught a recent Globe & Mail headline about the resurgence of religious sentiment among Canadian youth.

Some of us would register mild surprise that organized religion has remained dynamic. Within the political sector, however, the news of the Angus Reid poll (leaked before it was actually published) spread like wildfire. Political hacks immediately engaged in frenetic analysis of what the information meant for them.

The two parties most interested in the news were the New Democrats and the Canadian Alliance. The NDP hooked onto one of the themes that emerged in the poll, namely that while more than 80 percent of young Canadians identify with basic Christian tenets, they are not especially active adherents. Specifically, Canadian youth relate to the ethical values inherent in Christianity, but are less enthusiastic about ritual.

"That's us," said one senior NDP fixture, "and what we have to do is tap into that electoral vein to draw new support to the party" – not the most tasteful way to design an election strategy, but at worst, it amounts to exploiting an asset that already exists.

Scene in Ottawa
By G.K. SIMCOE

The more offensive conversations relate to the CA camp, suspect among the eastern establishment from the get go because of Reform's evangelical roots. All of a sudden, religious credentials have become a hot commodity.

Preston Manning's minions, who for 12 years have attempted to downplay his religious background, are now trumpeting it as a selling feature.

Tom Long's supporters have apparently been trying to establish his connection with basic Christian values (as if a man who has spent over half his 41 years in active politics would be the type to go to church every Sunday).

But the Stockwell Day camp emerged with the trump card. A supporter boasted that Day has the perfect combination of religious bona fides and James Dean-like rebelliousness (after all, he "confessed" to having smoked pot). "This will resonate perfectly with the most important electoral target group," crowed the supporter.

The sad part is that he is right. An Easter weekend CA poll indicated a significant increase in support for Day – not from new-found youthful members of the party, but rather from already committed CA members who are placing their bets.

Talk about ethical values!

You've always dreamed of retiring in Israel...
Now, realizing that dream can also be in your best financial interest.

Holocaust and art focus of conference

MONTREAL — A two-day conference entitled Evocations of the Holocaust in Contemporary Canadian Arts will be held May 4 and 5 at the Gelber Centre of the Jewish Community Campus.

"This conference brings together artists, creative writers and cultural historians from a wide variety of backgrounds and interests to discuss the impact of the Holocaust in recent Canadian art, architecture, film, theatre, music and literature," said its co-ordinator Loren Lerner, of the art history department of Concordia University. It is being organized with the Montreal Holocaust Memorial Centre.

The conference will feature different forms of presentation, including literary readings and video showings.

Among the invited speakers are theatre director Tibor Egervari on What to do with an Anti-Semitic Masterpiece; Norman Ravvin, who holds the chair in Canadian Jewish studies at Concordia University, on the topic The Holocaust as Buried Text: A Challenge in Fiction; writer Régine Robin on L'écriture de la fragmentation et l'Holocauste; Reesa Greenberg on Absences and Presence: Representations of the Holocaust in Canadian Museums; author Doug Beardsley reading from Close to the Gates; and Lisa Bleyer, whose subject is Healing Through Dance: Child of Survivor Seeks Catharsis in Choreography.

An art exhibition on the theme will open May 4 at 7 p.m. and continue until June 7 on the lower level of the campus. Artists represented are Sorel Cohen, Katja MacLeod Kessin, Mindy Yan Miller, Marie-Jeanne Musiol, Wendy Oberlander, Sylvia Safdie, Yvonne Singer and Marion Wagschal. They will engage in a dialogue May 4 from 8 to 10 p.m.

The conference is free and open to the public. Reservations should be made by calling 345-2605.

The event is also supported by the Jewish Community Foundation of Montreal and the Concordia University Centre for Canadian Jewish Studies.

Lubavitch couple makes inroads in Maritimes

By JOEL JACOBSON
Atlantic Correspondent

HALIFAX — Mendy and Bassie Feldman have brought an energy to Halifax that hasn't been seen in decades.

Rabbi Feldman, director of Chabad Lubavitch of the Maritimes, and his wife Bassie have been in the largest city in the Maritimes for five years. They are slowly convincing the Jewish community that Chabad programs are worth attending, that being Jewish is something to be proud of, and that learning more about one's religion is acceptable.

Halifax, a community of 1,500 Jewish people, has two synagogues – Beth Israel, which is Orthodox, and Shaar Shalom, a Conservative congregation. Each shul has a Hebrew after-school program and has run occasional community events. The Atlantic Jewish Council has tried, with limited success, to encourage parents to send their children to Sunday youth programs.

However, the Chabad Lubavitch outreach program appears to be making inroads. The Feldmans made their first statement soon after arriving in 1995, when they started a summer day camp for children unwilling or unable to go to the AJC's Camp Kadimah.

"We had 10 children the first summer," says the rebbitzen. "Last summer we had 35," children enrolled in a program that emphasizes Jewish learning, but in a fun atmosphere.

"The first Purim we were here, we had 14 people at a Purim celebration," says the rabbi. "In March 2000, for a program on a Purim in the shtetl theme, we had 150 – men, women and children – many dressed up and all enjoying themselves."

His wife adds, "If we do it right, and people see our enthusiasm and the enjoyment of others, they will come. If they come for either the spirituality or the party, they'll get both. It's just nice to see people celebrate. Our Purim party was equal to [that of] any big city and the percentage of Jews was the same as the big cities."

Purim attendance goes from 14 to 150

Halifax is the first posting for the Feldmans. He's from Brooklyn, N.Y., and she's a native of Thornhill, Ont.

"We were asked to come to Halifax," says Rabbi Feldman. "We had our choice, but because of the enthusiasm and devotion of the Rebbe [Menachem Schneerson], we came here."

Bassie says most people in Chabad know from a young age that outreach work is what they'll do.

"This is considered to be the holiest work. We were offered Halifax, saw a need, and have made a permanent commitment to stay here."

The couple has two children, Zevi, 5, born five weeks before their move to Halifax, and Levi, 3. "We've grown into the community," says Bassie. "At the beginning, the people might have been skeptical of us, but they've seen us develop a home here with plans to stay forever. This is where the kids will grow up."

As there is no Hebrew day school, Bassie home-schools Zevi and will do the same with Levi.

The couple have taken a portable sukkah to the universities and have had the students make the brachah over the lulav and etrog. Last Sukkot, they attracted close to 100 students.

At Chanukah, Rabbi Feldman arranges for an 18-foot menorah to be raised in the Grand Parade, which is adjacent to City Hall in downtown Halifax.

Last year, Zevi said the blessings with Halifax Mayor Walter Fitzgerald, Nova Scotia Premier John Hamm and Lieutenant-Governor James Kinley in attendance. Afterwards, everyone ate latkes in City Hall. Bassie arranged for groups of women and children to attend a craft shop, where they made menorahs and dreidels.

On the 50th anniversary of the Rebbe's leadership, the Feldmans held a community auction during which people bid to take on various mitzvot, such as attending a daily minyan more often, or being more observant of Shabbat.

"We were the first Lubavitch community to do this," says Bassie. "Halifax is a leader, not a follower."

The Feldmans have led Shabbatons, and now hold a pre-school two mornings a week and a one-week day camp in December for both teens and pre-teens. Bassie also runs a kosher catering service for visiting Jewish families, and she single-handedly prepared a community seder for 40 Haligonians.

"We've surpassed our expectations," Rabbi Feldman says, "but we're not satisfied. Our goal is to reach every Jew, but mainly the unaffiliated. We want to reach people who aren't connected enough."

The couple holds a monthly Shabbat service, as well as High Holy Day services and services throughout the month of Tishrei at a small shul in their home.

But Bassie says their nachas is the camps. "We're trying to give the children pride in their Jewishness.

"With no day school, little programming and mostly non-Jewish friends, our camps give them a Jewish environment. We're proud of that."

'Virtual comedy' comes to life on new Web site

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — With 6,000 sites devoted to humour and comedy, the Internet can be a pretty funny place.

Now two of Montreal's best known personalities have their "sites" set on launching a new era of virtual world humour.

Andy Nulman, former head of the Just for Laughs Festival, and Garner Bornstein, president and CEO of Generation Net Services Inc., say that by June they plan to have a new concept in World Wide Web drollery up and running.

The two are combining their entertainment and business savvy to create the site, thefunniest.com.

It will serve as as 24-hour-a-day, seven-day-a-week "virtual comedy festival," Bornstein said at a recent breakfast event of FEDERATION CJA's Hi-Tech and Communications Division and the Jewish Chamber of Commerce.

In an often funny projected-on-Internet-screen presentation, the two friends test marketed the idea on the 100 people at the breakfast, and tried to show how the site will be unique in the virtual world landscape.

"You're a focus group. If [the idea] crashes and burns," Bornstein joked, "you could say you were here."

So ambitious is their project and so high their hopes that the duo has spent the last months seeking to attract some of comedy's best-known names for the project. They've already signed Bob Newhart and Nathan Lane, and are negotiating with comedians Don Rickles and Robert Klein. They have also talked to Comedy Central, a U.S.-based cable channel.

Nulman and Bornstein stressed that the idea is not to be just another site with links. The difference lies in what thefunniest.com will do: It will be a creative "hub" or "platform" for everything from the passing on of jokes by Internet users and posting humour-based games, to a venue for stand-up comedy. (Newhart, for example, will be able to be seen doing his classic "telephone" routines on the site.)

It will give such routines "a whole new life" and make them accessible to generations who have never seen them before, Nulman said.

The site will also contain creative art and cartoons that will allow "raw ideas to be turned into the deliverable," Bornstein said.

A key to the site's success will be to give it "brand" identification, to create something totally different in the 500-channel universe, Bornstein said.

"You build a brand, and the business will follow," he predicted.

The two also hope to work hand-in-hand with the Just for Laughs festival, said Nulman, who described himself as "chief executive retina" of Eyeball Glue, a creative Internet and strategic content consulting agency.

Bornstein predicted that 20 percent of the site's content will be original, with the other 80 percent comprised of "aggregate" material gathered from a variety of sources.

"We can tap anyone with a funny idea for this new form of media comedy," Nulman said.

"This project is really positioned to take off," Bornstein said. "We'll be in a business we can really have fun with."

Barak may seek referendum on peace framework

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Barak is considering holding a national referendum when, and if, Israel and the Palestinian Authority agree on the framework of a final peace accord.

Sources close to Barak said the prime minister discussed the idea with cabinet members from his One Israel bloc.

First, however, Israel and the Palestinians must agree on the framework – no small task in light of the slow progress in talks so far.

On Sunday, the two sides launched accelerated talks aimed at reaching the broad outlines of a final accord.

Negotiators face a mid-May deadline for agreeing on the framework, but the sluggish pace of two previous rounds of talks held in Washington have prompted speculation that the target date may be again postponed to June.

After agreeing on the accord's framework, the two sides will then have to conclude the accord itself by Sept. 13 to meet a self-imposed deadline.

The negotiators have four thorny issues topping their agenda – Jerusalem, Jewish settlements, final borders and Palestinian refugees.

In an effort to help speed the pace of the talks, U.S. Middle East envoy Dennis Ross was expected to join the negotiators, who were to meet in the Red Sea resort of Eilat on Tuesday.

Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Barak

According to Israeli media reports on Sunday, Barak may soon transfer security control over three Arab towns near Jerusalem to the Palestinian Authority as an "advance" on a planned further pullback in the West Bank.

Barak would reportedly seek approval from his security cabinet for such a move, which is intended to build confidence in the talks with the Palestinians.

The villages – Abu Dis, Al-Azariya and Sawahara – are currently under Palestinian civil control and Israeli security control.

Arab towns near Jerusalem were initially to be included in an Israeli redeployment carried out several weeks ago.

But Barak came under political pressure from hawkish members of his government, and at the last minute the towns were excluded from the redeployment maps.

Barak began consulting Sunday with members of his coalition to see how they would react to his plans for advancing the negotiations.

Interior Minister Natan Sharansky, of the Yisrael Ba'Aliyah party, adamantly opposed the idea of transferring to the Palestinians, areas that "kiss Jerusalem."

I consider this a terrible mistake," Sharansky told Israel Radio.

"I truly hope we will be able to remain in the government," he added.

Barak's proposals draw criticism from both sides

Barak's proposals drew criticism from the Palestinian side as well. Palestinian negotiator Saeb Erekat said the Palestinian Authority would not accept any Israeli advance on the next redeployment without first knowing the total scope of the planned pullback.

Palestinian officials also cried foul when Israel announced its intention to build 170 new housing units in a Jewish settlement near Jerusalem.

Palestinian officials called the plans for Ma'aleh Adumim a betrayal of the peace process.

Meanwhile, ongoing tensions within Barak's coalition over domestic issues have cast doubt on the government's ability to make decisive political moves with the Palestinians.

The Shas and Meretz parties have been engaged for months in a dispute over funding for Shas' financially troubled school system.

Shas has repeatedly threatened to pull out of the government if it did not get government funds – and last Friday it was Meretz's turn.

Meretz, which controls the Education Ministry, said its ministers would resign from the government if Shas obtains special grants for its debt-ridden schools.

Meretz was responding to reports that Barak is ready to promise funds to Shas in exchange for its commitment to back the government's peace moves.

Yom Ha'atzmaut greetings

It gives me great pleasure to send you my greetings on Israel's 52nd Independence Day. Much has been achieved in our country during these 52 years. Millions of immigrants from the four corners of the earth have been successfully absorbed into Israeli society. Israel stands at the forefront in science, technology and agriculture and has attained recognition by most countries in the world and their leaders, who are anxious to visit and learn from our experience.

All this must be borne in mind when considering our ongoing struggle to achieve peace with our neighbours. This past year has had its full share of tragedies and setbacks. However, we must not become victims of helplessness and despondency. We are in the midst of a very difficult and protracted process with many painful contentions. However, just as peace treaties were concluded with Egypt and Jordan, I am convinced that eventually, these will also be achieved with the Palestinians, Syria and Lebanon.

Israel's President Ezer Weizman

The stronger we are and the greater in number, the easier it will be to attain our goals. I therefore once again call on you, our brothers and sisters in the Diaspora, to join us in our own sovereign country. Together we will continue to progress and create an even better country for the future generations.

In 1984, he blamed the cancellation of his book contract on Jewish organizations and cautioned that "they will live long to regret it."

In 1998, he compared American Jews' professional success to Jews in Weimar Germany and warned that such success might give "rise to the...same dire consequences as happened in Nazi Germany."

Regarding a Holocaust memorial in Baltimore, he asked, "Why do we need a memorial...we haven't done anything to the Jews yet."

I never anticipated the havoc this fight would wreak with my professional and personal life. At the post-verdict news conference, I was asked: "Given all that has happened, would you write the same things about Irving?"

The answer was "No." Were I writing my book now, I would write even more harshly about him. This legal action, which he instigated, allowed my lawyers to demand the release of reams of his personal papers documenting his activities. We know far more about him than we ever did before. We hoisted him on his own petard.

I fought him because I could not run from evil, even when the evil is rooted in nonsense, for nonsense can cause significant damage. The Protocols of the Elders of Zion are proven forgeries that are based on a ludicrous premise. Nonetheless, they continue to circulate. The Holocaust teaches that evildoers must be stopped early, before they can inflict much damage. Hitler was far less of a foe in the early 1930s than in the 1940s.

So too, deniers must be stopped now.

Though I would never have placed myself in the arena with him, once dragged in, I had no option but to fight. I have consistently refused to debate deniers. I have declined appearances on talk shows and news programs because they entailed appearing with a denier, giving the hotion that there are two sides to this issue.

I have not yet fully unpacked what it meant to be a defendant in a libel suit that brought together the Holocaust, free speech and historiography. I shall never forget as I entered the court on the first day being told by survivors: "We are counting on you."

Nor shall I forget being enveloped after the trial by a man outside the courtroom who said: "My parents died in Auschwitz. In their name: thank you."

An experienced litigant, Irving may have assumed I would "settle," i.e. pay some symbolic figure, apologize to him and agree to the withdrawal of my book from publication.

Two years prior to my book's publication, Irving described what happens to defendants in libel actions: "There comes a very expensive stage for both parties known as discovery...discovery is an ugly phase, for plaintiff and defendant, when you face each across a lawyer's table...and you say, 'I want to see your documents and you can see mine.' And at that stage usually the defendants crack up and cop out."

I was wrong to laugh 20 years ago when I first heard about deniers. I was wrong to laugh when I opened the letter informing me that Irving was considering a suit. And I was entirely wrong to assume that it was just a nuisance. It was far more than that.

But David Irving was far more wrong than I if he thought that I would "crack up and cop out." I did neither. I fought this charge with all my strength. It was a demanding battle.

Yet, on some level, it has also been a surprisingly rewarding endeavour. It taught me much about evil, but it also taught me about goodness, friendship and about doing the right thing. That too is part of this story.

Deborah E. Lipstadt is Dorot Professor of Modern Jewish and Holocaust Studies at Emory University. On April 11, a British court ruled against Irving, who had sued Lipstadt and Penguin Books, the publisher of her book, Denying the Holocaust: The Growing Assault on Truth and Memory.

TORONTO

Probationary Firefighters

Help make our City a safer place for all.

If you like helping people, work well with others, enjoy learning and are physically fit, this is a great time to compete for firefighter positions at the City of Toronto for possible openings in 2001. In addition to firefighting services, you will perform rescue work, fire prevention duties, administer first aid, respond to emergency hazardous material situations, and maintain firefighting apparatus, equipment and fire stations. To carry out these duties, you must be able to handle intense, sustained physical effort, communicate clearly in English under stressful situations, and work shifts (including nights and weekends).

Qualified applicants must be legally eligible to work in Canada, meet the prescribed hearing and visual requirements (20/30 in each eye without corrective lenses, and colour vision that is safe for firefighting), and have completed a minimum of Grade 12 (or equivalent as approved by the Ontario Ministry of Education). A valid Ontario driver's licence and the ability to obtain a class D (minimum) with Z brake endorsement by the time of job offer are also essential.

The first stage of the recruitment process is a written test, to be conducted beginning June 13, 2000. For further information on dates, times and locations, and to learn more about the recruitment process, you may do the following:

1. Pick up a recruitment information package, between May 8 and June 8, 2000, at one of the following locations:

   North York Civic Centre, 5100 Yonge Street
   York Civic Centre, 2700 Eglinton Avenue West
   Toronto City Hall, 100 Queen Street West
   Scarborough Civic Centre, 150 Borough Drive
   Etobicoke Civic Centre, 399 The West Mall
   East York Civic Centre, 850 Coxwell Avenue

2. Attend a Firefighter Career Information Session at the Toronto Fire Academy, 895 Eastern Avenue, Toronto, on one of the following dates:

   Saturday, May 13, 2000 — 10:00 a.m.

Committed to employment equity, the City of Toronto encourages applications from Aboriginal people, people with disabilities, racial minorities and women.

Infighting in Tehran may affect trial of Iranian Jews

By DANIEL SOBELMAN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The trial of 13 Iranian Jews accused of spying for the United States and Israel resumed Monday morning in Shiraz. The closed door trial, which began more than two weeks ago, takes place amid rising tensions between conservatives and reformists in Iran.

Husein Ali Amiri, head of the Shiraz district judiciary, earlier alleged that four of the accused have admitted to spying, but there was no independent confirmation of Amiri's claims.

The 13 were arrested in Shiraz and Isfahan and two months ago. Three were released on bail, one of them a 17 year old. Charges against these three were said to be "less serious."

An Iranian daily Monday quoted Amiri saying, "We will not allow any political gimmicks" in the trial, a reference to the fact that the suspects are Jews.

"We shall try the suspects as Iranian citizens," Amiri said.

He was also critical of the significant presence of foreign news agencies to report the trial, calling them "opportunists who turned a flea into an elephant."

The mounting tension between the reform and conservative movements in Iran is providing a colourful backdrop to the trial. Last week, the conservative administration closed down all reformist newspapers, and in the last month, Revolutionary Guard units, the backbone of the conservatives, have been on full alert amid expectations of violent protests by reformists. Other extremist conservative militias, the Ansar Hezbollah and the Basij, have been reported as preparing for clashes. Violent demonstrations swept Iran in July 1999.

President Mohammed Khatami, supported by the reformists, said last Saturday that he is worried about the deteriorating domestic situation and fears an eruption of violence.

Some analysts think the internal struggle in Iran could also be played out during the trial of the Jewish suspects. Diplomats and human rights organizations fear that the Iranian conservatives, who control the legal system, could influence judges and use the trial to strike a blow at the reformists.

Forward Editor forced to resign

By PETER EPHROSS
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — When Seth Lipsky was negotiating to launch the English-language edition of the Forward more than a decade ago, many touchy subjects came up, but perhaps none more combustible than that of Ze'ev Jabotinsky, Menachem Begin's ideological forefather.

Lipsky knew that Jabotinsky was the archenemy of the Labour Zionism that serves as one of the ideological underpinnings of the Forward Association, the longtime publisher of the renowned Yiddish paper.

But on that day in 1987, Lipsky – who considers the militant founder of Revisionist Zionism a hero – didn't back down, and the negotiations temporarily broke down, according to one source.

The talks with the board that owns about half of the paper were eventually restarted, leading to the creation in 1990 of the English-language Forward with Lipsky at its helm.

But as reports circulate of Lipsky's imminent forced resignation, the Jabotinsky conflict reflects the ideological struggles, over past as well as current politics, and eventually led to his presumed ouster.

Lipsky's departure date has been officially announced. He will be gone as of May 25. The terms of his departure have not been disclosed.

The paper is jointly owned by the Forward Association and a partnership funded by philanthropist Michael Steinhardt. In the wake of Lipsky's resignation, Steinhardt announced that he will sell his share of the paper back to the Forward Association, thus leaving the Assocation alone to absorb the financial losses the paper has been incurring – or to look for other donors.

Steinhardt said in an interview, he believed the Forward could survive without his financial involvement if the Forward Association chose to let it.

Soon after Lipsky was appointed editor of the paper, Rabbi Arthur Hertzberg wrote the Forward Association, saying that while he supported Lipsky's right to express his opinions, "to do so on the money accumulated on a socialist or social democratic platform" – as the Forward had – was absurd.

At the time, says Rabbi Hertzberg, now a visiting professor at New York University, the board virtually ignored his letter, turning it over to Lipsky.

But a decade later, the board appeared to share his conclusions. Sources say that after Sam Norich took over as general manager of the association in 1998, he began pressing for Lipsky's removal.

Norich made it clear that he did not feel the Forward's tradition was being well served, according to a source familiar with the developments.

Norich and Harold Ostroff, chair of the newspaper, declined to comment, citing the ongoing negotiations.

In retrospect, the relationship between Lipsky and the association was a marriage that was destined for divorce.

The Yiddish-language Forvertz, which in the 1920s had a circulation nearing 250,000, had made its name as the voice of immigrant socialism – but not communism – and the Jewish labour movement.

Lipsky, on the other hand, came from a background that included time at the staunchly free market and politically conservative editorial board of the Wall Street Journal.

He hewed to a hard line on peace both with Syria and the Palestinians, most recently attacking Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Barak for having a "double standard" for "assiduously courting and praising the dictator at Damascus, Hafez al-Assad."

As egregious to those members of the Forward Association, he published blistering editorials and incendiary front-page articles attacking beliefs long held by the majority of the Jewish establishment on such issues as welfare reform and school vouchers.

Indeed, the Jewish establishment came under constant criticism – some would say slander – for what Lipsky saw as its liberal ideology and clandestine operations.

A recent headline, If Police Spot a Clown in the Capitol, It Might Be Steve Solender on the Job, referred to the president and chief executive officer of the United Jewish Communities.

Some 39 executives of local Jewish federations signed a letter in last week's edition, protesting the headline.

He wrote several editorials attacking the UJA-Federation of Greater Philanthropies of New York for what he saw as the unfair advantage that the New York Jewish Week enjoys because contributors to the New York federation automatically receive subscriptions to that paper.

Indeed, reaction to the news of Lipsky's apparent ouster among Jewish organizational officials – many of whom assiduously read but simultaneously revile the paper – was swift.

"You can't go around slandering people and not think you're going to pay a price for it," said a key leader in the Jewish organizational world, who asked not to be identified.

But, added this insider, the Forward might not be as interesting if Lipsky does leave.

Lawrence Rubin, the executive vice chair of the Jewish Council for Public Affairs, an umbrella group that the Forward often attacked, said, "I think that the Forward has been independent, but it hasn't maintained journalistic standards."

Jewish officials often complained to Steinhardt, the hedge-fund manager-turned-philanthropist who has devoted increasing resources to the Jewish world, and to the Forward Association.

Some observers say all of this may not have mattered had the paper not lost so much money.

But the English-language version is suffering annual losses of approximately $2 million, according to The New York Times. Its circulation never topped 30,000, and it never achieved the daily publication envisioned by Lipsky.

"If Lipsky had succeeded in creating a going concern, he might have gotten away with it, but he didn't create a going concern," said Hertzberg.

Both past and current staff have come to Lipsky's defence.

In a letter to Forward Association officials, past staff members, several of whom have gone on to careers at such publications as the New York Times Magazine and the New Yorker, wrote: "It would be devastating both for the cause of free journalism and for the Jewish community if the Forward were to cease publication; it would be equally terrible, however, if the Forward were to continue to publish without Seth Lipsky at its helm. Seth is not merely the editor of the English-language Forward, he is its animating spirit."

Meanwhile, the president of the company that publishes the Detroit Jewish News and the Atlanta Jewish Times says the developments at the Forward will not affect those papers, of which Steinhardt recently invested and became chair.

"The reasons why Steinhardt is involved in Detroit and Atlanta stand on its own merits," said Arthur Horwitz.

Meanwhile, the staff is working with the increasing feeling that they might be working aboard a sinking ship.

"Morale is in the toilet," said one staffer.

Many Russian Jews are dodging the draft

By LEV GORODETSKY
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

MOSCOW — Dmitry Neverovsky is out of jail, but he is not out of trouble.

A Russian court released the Jewish computer programmer, who was given a two-year jail sentence in November for refusing to serve in Russia's war in Chechnya, pending an appeal.

But Neverovsky, 26, is not allowed to leave his native city of Obninsk, located southeast of Moscow, until his appeal is heard.

Neverovsky is not alone in wanting to avoid the bloody Chechen war. The number of Russians, Jews and non-Jews alike, who are avoiding the draft has skyrocketed since the war broke out last fall in Chechnya with Muslim guerrillas, prompting the chief of the Mobilization Department of Russia's General Staff, Col. Gen. Vladislav Putilin, to complain of a manpower shortage.

Even though all Russian males under the age of 27 must serve in the army, Jews are particularly reluctant to do so – and this is nothing new.

Since the mid-19th-century reign of Czar Nicholas I, whose mandatory 25-year military service for Jews was considered a certain death sentence, Jewish families have, with the exception of World War II, generally tried to avoid having their sons conscripted into the Russian army.

"All Russian Jewish parents are terribly afraid of the army because of the old army tradition of anti-Semitism and because of the war in Chechnya, and try to put their boys in the universities by all means," said Vladimir Shapiro, a leading Jewish sociologist in Moscow.

Many potential Jewish draftees are ineligible because they receive an exemption by attending university, where they complete some kind of "military instruction course." After graduation, they become part of the reserve corps, which is normally not called up for duty.

Other Jewish draftees, as well as their non-Jewish compatriots, try to dodge service by getting a medical deferral, getting a job at a strategically crucial firm – or by simply bribing draft board officials.

Jewish high school students can also avoid the draft by enrolling in one of the Jewish Agency for Israel's programs for high school students that send boys and girls to complete their schooling in Israel. After the students complete their schooling, many boys stay in Israel to avoid service in the Russian army.

Jewish Agency offices in Russia and Ukraine have run into problems on this issue with the authorities, who are not happy with this additional drain on potential draftees.

"Normally I wouldn't have had much against the service. But with the Chechen war and hazing, I am going to use every possible way to avoid the army in Russia, including emigrating to Israel and serving in the Israeli army," says Konstantin, 17, one of whose parents is Jewish.

But Neverovsky never used any of these escape routes.

In 1995, he dropped out of the Obninsk Institute of Atomic Energy's course in military instruction in protest over the first war in Chechnya, which ended in 1996.

"Dmitry didn't want to have anything to do with the army, which wages war against its own people," said his mother, Tatyana Kotlyar, who is a member of the Obninsk city council and a campaigner for the right to alternative military service.

When the military tried to draft him after he graduated in 1997, Neverovsky tried to use his constitutional right to alternative civilian service and even sued the draft board for this right, but lost the case.

The current situation tests Russian President Vladimir Putin's vow to impose the rule of law.

In 1996, Russia's Constitutional Court ruled that "the right to alternative service should be ensured, regardless of whether the corresponding federal law has been passed or not."

But draft boards and judges pay no attention to this ruling.

At the same time, many are accusing Putin of a "creeping militarization of schools" after his recent decree to revive military training for 11th-graders in Russian state schools.

I see this decree as a "step back in the democratic process. Military training should be voluntary and the right to alternative military service should exist," says Vyacheslav Leshchiner, director of the state-run Jewish ORT school in Moscow.

Pittsburgh's Jews shaken by shooting spree

By PETER EPHROSS
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — Jewish facilities in Pittsburgh are increasing security measures following last week's shooting rampage that killed five individuals from minority ethnic groups – including one Jewish woman.

Richard Scott Baumhammers, 34, allegedly began his spree by killing Anita Gordon, a Jewish woman who was one of his next door neighbours and a family friend.

Security guards and city police officers patrolled the city's JCC building in Squirrel Hill, which was also requiring members to show ID cards before entering, while the suburban Jewish Community Center of the South Hills temporarily went into a lockdown after the shooting occurred last week.

Rabbi Neal Scheindlin of Beth El Congregation of Short Hills, one of two synagogues that was fired upon in the rampage, said the synagogue will buy a new security system.

Police have charged Baumhammers with one of the murders and he was awaiting arraignment for the others. State and federal authorities are determining whether he should face hate crimes charges.

The Jewish victim, Gordon, a 63-year-old married mother of three daughters, was known for her work as a volunteer at Beth El Congregation.

"Many members talked of her as if she were a second mother," said Rabbi Scheindlin.

Three of those also killed in the spree were immigrants – an Indian man, Anil Thakur, and two Asian men, Thao Pham and Ji-Ye Sun.

An African American man, Garry Lee, was also shot and killed.

Israel & the Jewish World

Israel, West watching developments in Iran

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Mideast Analysis

Iran is being convulsed by a struggle of historic proportions, pitting Islamic hardliners against Islamic reformers. Israeli leaders are watching this unfolding ideological battle with the utmost interest, hoping that moderates will prevail, open up Iran to the West and reassess Iran's current policy of hostility toward Israel. Iran severed diplomatic relations with Israel 21 years ago, and turned into an implacable foe.

Iran has been under the thumb of a staunchly theocratic regime since the 1979 Islamic revolution, when Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini ousted the pro-western Pahlavi monarchy. But in the past three years, much to the chagrin of Islamic radicals, Islamic moderates have scored two major electoral victories which have had the effect of broadening democracy and civil rights in this pivotal Middle Eastern nation of 65 million people.

In May 1997, Mohammed Khatami, a former aide to Khomeini, was elected Iran's president in a landslide triumph. Several months ago, the reform movement, which Khatami has encouraged, won three-quarters of the seats in parliament.

As a result of these victories, Khatami started to loosen some of the onerous restrictions that have oppressed ordinary Iranians.

A relatively independent press began to emerge, and in the most recent signs of liberalization, the regime gave Iranians permission to possess "immodest" pictures, video films and cassette tapes for personal use only.

Despite these developments, the hardliners, spearheaded by Ayatollah Ali Khameini, Iran's spiritual leader, are still very much in charge, controlling the police, the armed forces, the judiciary and the courts. Given the enormous power they wield, the hardliners have tried to hold back the tide of change by means of a campaign of intimidation and violence.

Shortly after February's parliamentary elections, gunmen riding a BMW motorcycle of the kind restricted to the Iranian police and army shot and critically wounded Saeed Hajjarian, a newspaper editor, a Tehran city council member and a close associate of Khatami.

The shooting came on the heels of a series of incidents instigated by hardliners in 1998 and 1999. In short order, they arrested two of Khatami's most important allies – Gholamhossein Karbaschi, the mayor of Tehran, and Abdullah Nouri, the minister of interior, and crushed a student revolt in the capital.

Last week, the hardliners dealt the moderates a grievous blow by closing all 16 reformist newspapers, including one owned by Khatami's brother. They also arrested three journalists and charged two others with offending "religious sensibilities."

The hardliners are also behind the imprisonment of 13 Iranian Jews accused of spying for Israel. Their trial, which began on May 1, is widely regarded as an anti-Western exercise designed to embarrass the moderate camp in Iran.

In a bid to strengthen moderate forces, the United States has tried to establish a new relationship with Iran. In March, Secretary of State Madeleine Albright abolished a ban on the import of Iranian luxury goods ranging from caviar to carpets.

Yet Washington is still a long way off from restoring ties with Iran, broken off in 1979 when militants seized the U.S. embassy in Tehran. A resumption of relations will only be possible, Washington says, when Iran stops supporting terrorism, drops its opposition to the Arab-Israeli peace process, and ceases efforts to acquire non-conventional weapons of mass destruction.

Mohammed Khatami

Although Khatami has said that Iran will not interfere in Arab-Israeli peace negotiations, his assurance carries little weight with hardliners. Due to their influence, Iran has not relaxed its hostile attitude to Israel, whose very existence it opposes. Six months ago, Ayatollah Khameini described Israel as "a cancerous growth."

Since Khatami's emergence on the scene, Israel has reclassified Iran from an "enemy" to a "security threat." Yet Israel remains wary of Iran, which continues to supply Hamas and Hezbollah with weapons and with moral and financial support.

Iran reclassified from enemy to 'security threat'

According to Gen. Shaul Mofaz, Israel's chief of staff, Iran will try to foil a peace agreement between Israel and Syria, the likelihood of which has greatly diminished in the past month.

It would therefore seem that an Israeli-Iranian rapprochement is still far off.

Israel's status at UN to change?

By MICHAEL J. JORDAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — After years of lobbying and disappointment, Israel may be on the verge of changing its status as the only United Nations member shut out of a regional group.

Israel moved one step closer to membership in the Western European and Others Group (WEOG) last week, when UN ambassadors from the 15 countries that comprise the European Union agreed that Israel should be accepted to WEOG as a full – albeit temporary – member.

Israel's logical place is within the Asian grouping, but Iraq and Iran show no sign of ever welcoming Israel. Israel sees its next best choice as the 26-member WEOG, which also includes the United States, Canada, Australia and New Zealand.

Analysts say the group has dragged its feet on admitting Israel because some members are concerned about angering their allies in the Arab world.

Membership in one of the UN's five regional groupings is more than symbolic. An enhanced status for Israel would mean a stronger voice in UN affairs, though exactly how strong a role it could play would depend on any conditions that might be placed on Israel's membership.

The development comes as Israel, which has often felt isolated and unfairly singled out for condemnation in the world body, has expressed concern that it may be a target at the UN conference on nuclear non-proliferation, which is taking place this month in New York.

Israel is one of four countries that has not signed the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty, and it has not officially admitted to having nuclear capabilities. The other non-signatories are Cuba, India and Pakistan.

The WEOG development also comes in the wake of Israel's formal announcement that it will comply with the 1978 UN resolution that calls on it to withdraw from southern Lebanon.

It is not clear whether either of these issues will affect – positively or negatively – WEOG's decision to accept Israel.

But as Portugal's ambassador to the United Nations put it, "Everything is political in these delicate issues.

"The atmosphere is always more favourable in the minds of politicians if positive steps are taken" in the Middle East, said Antonio Monteiro, the ambassador from Portugal, the nation currently holding the rotating presidency of the European Union.

As a result of last week's meeting, the European Union was to recommend Israel's full membership to WEOG, Monteiro said.

Momentum favours membership

"The EU now has a unified position," Monteiro told JTA. "We realized we could not delay this any more. Israel naturally belongs to the Asian group, but since conditions do not exist, the principle of exclusion should not prevail."

Israel's membership in WEOG would be temporary, he said, with the ultimate goal of getting Israel accepted by the Asian group.

The momentum clearly favours Israeli membership, but negotiations are far from over.

The devil will be in the details, say observers – in this case informing Israel of what WEOG calls "modalities."

Monteiro described them as the various practices and mechanisms designed to avert clashes between WEOG members big and small, northern and southern.

Monteiro went to lengths not to refer to modalities as "conditions," but that is how they are viewed by Israeli and American Jewish officials.

Indeed, in light of the fierce competition for appointments to key WEOG and UN committees, these officials express concern that Israel may be allowed in only if it agrees to forsake certain posts and other rights to which all other members are entitled.

But Israel believes such conditions would remain an injustice and would continue to violate the UN charter, which holds that each UN member is equal.

"We have said all along that we do not want to substitute one anomaly for another anomalous situation," said Aaron Jacob, Israel's deputy permanent representative to the United Nations.

"We are willing to accept certain temporary limitations, but we are not willing to accept restrictions that will render our membership meaningless."

Another diplomat close to the negotiations, who requested anonymity, said the modalities may also be an effort to appease the Arab and Muslim states in the United Nations, who constitute a huge, influential bloc.

No European member wants to be seen as "the one that allowed in Israel," said the diplomat, noting that those states could threaten an economic boycott.

"The Europeans may want to water down Israel's membership," he said, "so they can tell the Arab world that we let them in, but not entirely."

Israel was inching toward WEOG membership in the mid-1990s, until the November 1995 assassination of Yitzhak Rabin. The Europeans were loath to reward his replacement, Benjamin Netanyahu, with WEOG membership because of his perceived intransigence in peace negotiations with the Palestinians.

At the same time, some within WEOG were concerned that opening the door to Israel might encourage others in Europe, like the Baltic and central Europeans countries now in the Eastern European grouping, to bang on the door for WEOG membership.

Families, Baseball and Shabbat

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

It is often very difficult to adjust to having a new stepfather or stepmother in your life, even if he or she is very nice. Sometimes, well, more than sometimes, it seems that if you let yourself get close to a step-parent, you are being disloyal to your natural parent.

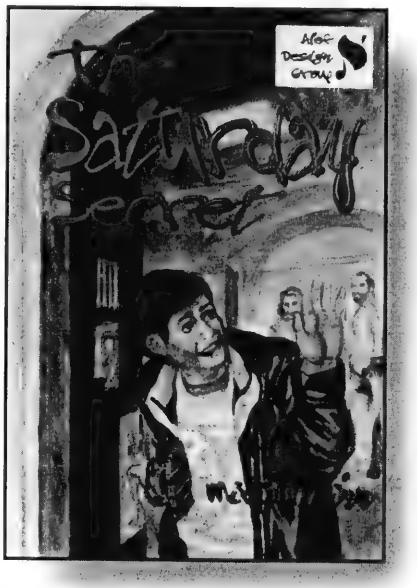
It is even harder when the step-parent tries to change the way the family lives.

That's the challenge facing Jason Siegel in The Saturday Secret, by Miriam Rinn (Alef Design Group, 1999). In the first place, it seems like David, his stepfather, has made his mother forget all about Jason's own father.

To make matters worse, David has become religious, and insists that the family keep kosher and observe Shabbat. He even wants Jason to wear a kippah. All these things wouldn't be totally awful, except for the fact that it is baseball season.

The team is doing very well this year, and Jason is the star pitcher. The problem is that some of the games are on Saturday afternoon.

Jason is very angry that everything seems to be changing without his having any say. He is upset that he can't play Nintendo on Saturday and that he can't celebrate his birthday at a Chinese restaurant. (The fact that David arranges for the family and some of his friends to go to a kosher Chinese restaurant helps a little.)



Jason decides that although his mother is going along with David's ideas, he doesn't have to. He arranges to pick up his uniform and glove at a friend's house on Saturdays, telling the family that he is going to visit his grandfather, or that he is taking part in a shul function.

Naturally, the truth starts to come out. In the process, Jason realizes that his stepfather has a lot of good qualities. He is understanding when a black friend of Jason's is treated badly at a restaurant, he apologizes when he blows up at Jason and hurts his feelings, and stands up to the abusive baseball coach, when no one else has the courage to do so.

But then, Jason gets hurt at a baseball game. Meanwhile, his parents think he is at a synagogue rally for the homeless. He is convinced that his family won't break the Shabbat rules to come and help him.

Jason gets quite a surprise by what happens – and in the process, learns what being a religious Jew really means.

Two films cement our impressions of modern Israel

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

Although at first glance, the two Israeli films, Aaron Cohen's Debt (1999) and Late Summer Blues (1987) seem markedly different in plot, tone and structure, they bear more than a passing similarity in their dual depictions of the bureaucratic altar of the Israeli state, on which individual needs, dreams and even lives are sacrificed.

They are among a handful of Israeli films being showcased at this year's Toronto Jewish Film Festival, May 4 to 11 at the Hyland Cinema on Yonge Street north of St. Clair Avenue.

Seeing these two excellent cinematic offerings in juxtaposition may cement our impression of modern Israel as a far less kind and gentle society than it was 30 years ago, and one far more enmeshed in the ugly social realities of selfishness and bureaucratic corruption.

After coming up against the state, characters in both films experience a loss of innocence and life. In director Renen Schorr's well-received Late Summer Blues, which is set in the peacenik era of 1970, a troupe of young student musicians wrestles with the inevitability of military service and the necessity of curtailing their musical antiwar protests. Those who die are fallen heroes struggling for the common good.

Moshe Ivgi in Aaron Cohen's Debt.

In Aaron Cohen's Debt (directed by Amalia Margolin), the protagonist is a middle-aged man (Moshe Ivgi) who is arrested at his own birthday party for failing to make an alimony payment.

Led away by police, he descends into a Kafkaesque nightmare in prison as his daughter, a singer in a band, repeatedly tries to redeem him. Alas, the police computer is down and none of the officers care to intervene: they're preoccupied by a soccer match. This time, tragedy results because no one will take the responsibility to help someone in apparent difficulty and pain.

Based on a true story that rocked Israel, Aaron Cohen's Debt is a riveting and disturbing portrait of police indifference, compounded by a subsequent coverup. As compared with the wistful warmth of Late Summer Blues, which tells of the coming of age of a hopeful generation, the newer film is a shocking indictment of an ugly and cynical side of Israeli life.

Both films present young hopeful musicians who awaken to difficult social realities, but the awakening in the earlier film is soft and gentle, and brutal and traumatic in the latter.

In Hebrew with English subtitles, Debt is being screened Wed. May 10, 8:15 p.m. with writer Alon Bar and actor Moshe Ivgi in attendance.

Also with subtitles, Late Summer Blues is scheduled for Friday May 5, 1:30 p.m. It's being shown with the Israeli short, Striptease.

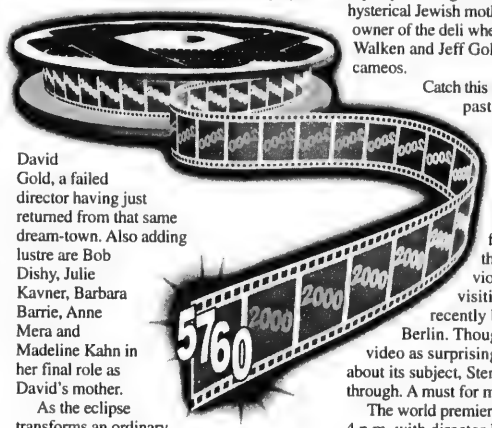
It's hard to convey the essence of Judy Berlin (1999), though not the excited reactions it tends to generate. An American-made black-and-white feature written and directed by Eric Mendelsohn, Judy Berlin focuses on the intertwined lives and aspirations of a curious ensemble of characters (some Jewish) living in a Long Island commuter town called Babylon, on the afternoon of a long, and increasingly surreal, solar eclipse.

Judy Berlin combines all the short-story sharpness of Rod Serling's Twilight Zone with the starkness of The Last Picture Show and the refreshing quirkiness of Fargo (without, I'm happy to report, any of the violence).

Mendelsohn, a young Woody Allen-like author, honed his craft working as a minor technocrat on numerous of Allen's flicks. Not surprisingly, this, his first feature film, lassoed the best director award at Sundance last season.

The cast sparkles. Edie Falco plays the eponymous lead, an aspiring actress about to leave for Hollywood; Aaron Harnick plays David Gold, a failed director having just returned from that same dream-town. Also adding lustre are Bob Dishy, Julie Kavner, Barbara Barrie, Anne Mera and Madeline Kahn in her final role as David's mother.



As the eclipse transforms an ordinary sleepy day in Babylon, the strange light illuminates the lonely lives of its inhabitants in peculiar ways and turns the suburban vista into a dreamscape.

Experimental and exhilarating, Judy Berlin is a delightful and finely rendered minimalist sketch that turns its back on the overblown demands of modern audiences for Hollywood-style plot formulations. It's filled with unexpected moments, humour and inventiveness. Don't even try to explain it: just enjoy it.

Judy Berlin is playing Monday May 8, 7 p.m. and again Wed. May 10, 2 p.m.

Commendably, this year's festival revisits a few familiar but rarely screened titles such as Next Stop, Greenwich Village (1976), by American director Paul Mazursky (also known for Enemies: A Love Story and Down and Out in Beverley Hills).

Funny, lighthearted and charming, Next Stop tells the purportedly semi-autobiographical tale of Mazursky's own youthful experiences with a bohemian crowd in New York's Village circa 1953.

Lenny Baker and Ellen Greene make brilliant cinematic debuts as, respectively, would-be actor Larry Lapinsky and his girlfriend. Equally dazzling are Shelley Winters as Larry's hysterical Jewish mother and Lou Jacobi as the owner of the deli where he works. Christopher Walken and Jeff Goldblum deliver sparkling cameos.

Catch this memorable blast from the past on Tues. May 9, 9:30 p.m.

The 44-minute German documentary Violin Up! Isaac Stern in Cologne, focuses on a few master classes with the 79-year-old legendary violinist, who is also shown visiting Daniel Libeskind's recently built Jewish Museum in Berlin. Though some may regard the video as surprisingly light on background about its subject, Stern's character still shines through. A must for music lovers.

The world premiere occurs Wed. May 10 at 4 p.m. with director Michael Meert in attendance.

In keeping with its longstanding tradition of offering obscure Yiddish classics, this year's fest offers Der Yidishe Nigun (The Jewish Melody), which Josef Seiden directed in America in 1940; the cast includes Izidor Casher, Lazar Freed and Chaim Tauber. The songs are by Sholom Secunda.

Everything about this musical romantic comedy, which focuses on two pairs of mismatched lovers who straighten everything out just as they reach the altar, is slow and old-fashioned. But that's to be expected: the joy comes from a handful of fine comic bits that are well worth the price of admission.

Since subtitles are present but sparse, working knowledge of Yiddish is a definite asset when viewing this newly struck print. Screened with the 13-minute Canadian short, Village of Idiots. Sunday May 7, 1:30 p.m.

Play is an autobiographical peek at actors' relationship

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

Joe Bologna and Renée Taylor celebrate 35 years of love, marriage and comedy.

TORONTO — If You Ever Leave Me...I'm Going With You! playing at the Winter Garden Theatre is a multi-visual autobiographical stage show co-written by Renée (The Nanny) Taylor and her husband Joe (Big Daddy) Bologna.

The audience gets to peek into the personal and professional lives of the two actors, directors, screenwriters and playwrights of 40 works, including the Oscar nominated Lovers and Other Strangers.

"The show is a celebration of love, marriage and comedy over the 35 years we've been together," Taylor says. "It tells the story of how we met and fell in love, and what we were writing during our relationship. We do comedy scenes together from plays and movies we've written. I get to fall in love with Joe every night all over again. You can't do comedy unless you are in a state of love."

It was love at first sight, Taylor says, at least on her part. "I was looking for writing help. Our mutual manager introduced us. He said, 'Here's a guy you're going to have a comedy rapport with,' and the minute I looked into Joe's eyes and shook his hand, I thought, 'This is the man I'm going to marry.'

"He later told me that when we met, he thought, 'This woman is looking at me very funny.'"

The play recaptures their unusual wedding reception on The Merv Griffin Show. Taylor was a regular on the show, and she kept Griffin's viewers informed on the progress of her relationship with Bologna.

Once she became engaged, she planned to have a reception at New York's Tavern On The Green, but complained on air to Griffin about paying $12 per person for chicken – pricey in the '60s.

"Merv said, 'Let me give you the wedding reception right here on stage. We'll make a home movie and show it on my television show.' I thought it was a great idea. Joe thought it was a bad idea, but it turned out to be great, because 35 years ago, marrying a Jew was a big deal. So, a lot of people weren't going to come to the wedding, until they found out it was going to be televised."

As you will discover in the play, this was the first of five weddings for the couple, she a New York Jew, he an Italian American Catholic.

"The first time, we had to get married in the Catholic Church or his family wouldn't come. The second time, it was a Jewish wedding or my family wouldn't come. We had such a good time at that wedding that we got a rabbi to marry us again. The fourth time, we had a Protestant minister we know marry us, and the fifth time, we had a Buddhist wedding with chanting bells – it was beautiful," Taylor says.

Although she strongly feels a Jew is always a Jew, she and Bologna have taken pleasure in being blessed by clergy of many faiths including the Pope and the Dalai Lama, she says.

"The Jewish faith is very exciting to me. My son Gabriel is a Holocaust scholar and a certified Nazi Hunter for the Simon Wiesenthal Centre. His Greek wife is studying the Kabbalah and converting to Judaism. Their son, my grandson Juiliano Giovanni Bologna had a bris."

Taylor and Bologna have a long list of credits on film, television and stage together and independently. Most remember her as wacky Sylvia Fine on The Nanny.

Projects they produced together include their first effort, called Lovers and Other Strangers, which garnered them an Academy Award nomination when it was made into a movie. Other projects included the Emmy Award-nominated special, Paradise; the Emmy-winner, Acts of Love and Other Comedies; and the couple's third motion picture collaboration, It Had To Be You.

Currently, their stage hit Bermuda Avenue Triangle is being made into a movie.

In addition, Taylor is a best-selling author, having penned My Life On A Diet, a spoof on "how to" celebrity health books.

When the couple find time to relax at home, Taylor enjoys her garden. "I like to sit in my beautiful garden. I have plants from all over the world. I love my roses. This was Shirley Temple's house when she was young and I think the roses are that old."

Admitting only to being in her very, very late 30s, Taylor says, "I'm at the best part of life now. I can really grow as a person, learn things and go deeper. I'm most interested in finding the meaning and wisdom of my life."

If You Ever Leave Me...I'm Going With You! plays until May 28 at the Winter Garden Theatre. For tickets call 416-872-5555.

Middle East history for idiots

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Has there ever been a moment when the Middle East was not in turmoil politically or militarily?

A coup in Egypt or Syria. A Palestinian uprising in the territories. A civil war in Yemen. The Arab-Israeli wars. Islamic fundamentalist terrorism. Fighting in Lebanon.

The list goes on and on.

But if the whirl of events confuses and confounds you, Mitchell Bard's book, The Complete Idiot's Guide to Middle East Conflict (Alpha Books); will come as a great relief.

Four hundred and seventy pages in length, it is encyclopedic in breadth and stylistically easy to read. It is balm to readers who haven't always been able to grasp the shifting complexities of this vitally important region.

Not a stone is left unturned. Broadly speaking, Bard begins at the beginning, with the patriarchal period, and ends with the most recent diplomatic developments in the Mideast peace process.

More specifically, Bard fills in the blanks regarding the rise of the modern Zionist movement and of Arab nationalism, the monumental effects of World War I on the area, the evolution of the Jewish community in Palestine, the Palestinian Arab backlash, and the events leading up to the 1948 War of Independence.

Bard also analyzes the causes of Israel's subsequent wars with the Arabs, surveys the cycle of Arab terrorism and Israeli reprisals, and charts the growth of immigration to and democracy in Israel.

In addition, he describes Anwar Sadat's historic visit to Israel, the Camp David accords, the Iran-Iraq War, Israel's incursions into Lebanon, the Gulf War, the Oslo peace negotiations, and Israel's peace treaty with Jordan.

The back of the book features a useful time line from 3000 BCE (the dawn of history in Sumer and Egypt) to 1999 (King Hussein's death), as well as a chart of the military balance in the Middle East.

Bard dispenses timely insights (almost all the borders in the Middle East and ill-defined or in dispute) and drops arcane but interesting facts (Nathan Birnbaum, a journalist, coined the word "Zionism").

In a volume of this size and ambition, factual errors are inevitable. Two examples will suffice: The Hebron accord was signed in 1997, not 1998. The War of Attrition lasted three years, not nearly two years.

Some of his assumptions are questionable.

Yitzhak Rabin, he claims speciously, "used negotiations as a fig leaf for what was essentially a unilateral withdrawal from the territories." A superficial assessment.

And Bard underestimates the Palestinian Arab fear of being displaced by Jewish settlers.

Despite these blips, The Complete Idiot's Guide to Middle East Conflict is recommended. It is well worth reading and constantly consulting.

• Spectacle is a showing of the works of Ottawa-born artist Mark Garland, who builds life-sized figures from fibreboard, then uses paint and collage techniques to fashion them into creatures intended to represent various emotions. Gallery one2one, 326 Carlaw, suite 121. May 6 to June 3. Opening reception, May 6, 4 to 7 p.m.

• Works of photographer Beverley Abramson focusing on Italy's romantic mysteries are on view at the Robert Mede Gallery, 321 Davenport Rd., now through June 3. 416-966-9362.

• Sotheby's London is selling works by the Jewish-Russian artist Isaac Ilich Levitan (1860-1900), a celebrated landscape painter, as part of its Russian Sale. It's estimated that one Levitan painting, Marshes in the Evening, may fetch as much as 180,000 British pounds. May 10.

Doors Open Toronto: The city of Toronto celebrates its architectural heritage with the first-ever event meant to help the ordinary citizen get his or her proverbial foot in the door of scores of heritage properties that are normally closed to the public.

Doors Open Toronto offers free entrance to some 70 architectural gems such as the Flatiron Building, Osgoode Hall, the Arts and Letters Club, the Guild Inn, the Masonic Temple, the CP Roundhouse and many more. While similar events have proven vastly popular in Europe, Australia and Brazil, this is the first time such an event has been organized in Toronto.

"The time is right to show some pride in our architectural landmarks," say event organizers Michael and Anne Tippin, owners of several historic properties including the Flatiron Building.

The public is invited to a free launch party on May 26. For details, visit the Web site at www.doorsopen.org or phone 416-392-6827, ext. 265.

Auvers owes much of its fame to Vincent van Gogh

By WOLF ARNOLD
Special to The CJN

AUVERS, FRANCE — Auvers is a lovely town on the Ile-de-France where the Oise flows quietly and joins the Seine west of Paris.

Landscape painters benefited from this countryside of river and hills, supplying an endless variety of motifs. Beneath sloping fields to the north, huddle the houses of the village; there is the church, the town's square and the Mairie (city hall), bringing to mind a picture of a typical small town in northern France.

On a fine summer's day the sun rises here in all its glory, touching the golden wheat fields above town, while streets and lanes still lie deserted in the early morning mist.

The town owes much of its fame to Vincent van Gogh. The 37-year-old artist arrived at Auvers from the psychiatric hospital in southern France, his spirits renewed. He was "healthy, broad-shouldered, his expression lively and determined," his sister-in-law later remembered.

A local doctor met him at the station and arranged a room for him, but the artist soon moved to an inn across from the Mairie, the little town hall of Auvers. Hardly acclimatized, the artist, an unceasing letter-writer, wrote to his brother in Paris that at Auvers he found "lush country…no factories, but lovely greenery in abundance and well kept…I am living a day at a time, the weather is so beautiful, and I am absorbed in my work."

He certainly was absorbed in his work, producing a canvas at the rate of almost one per day.

Down the street from Ravoux's auberge and slightly uphill, stands the venerable village church of Notre-Dame complete with flying buttresses and Romanesque arches. It served the artist for one of his most memorable paintings, and still today you might find an admirer standing there, sketch pad in hand, drawing the church from the same position as van Gogh painted it.

In a small square below the church, stands a modest memorial to the painter Charles Daubigny. Wearing a beret and holding a palette, he reminds us of all the artists who worked in the countryside here: Corot, Berthe Morisot, Pissarro, and Cézanne.

Daubigny, who had first discovered the Oise valley, was so enthralled with the village that he kept a barge moored at the riverbank on which he travelled the Oise, painting river scenes.

Go still farther uphill along a dirt path, and you come to the cemetery where the Van Gogh brothers found their final resting place. (Theodor van Gogh died shortly after Vincent's suicide and his remains were transferred to Auvers.)

Outside the compound is a small parking area where you see a young couple quietly having a picnic in the shade of a tree.

In the calm of the summer day you can explore the graveyard at leisure, and if you feel so inclined, pay homage to the unfortunate painter whose grave is in the far left corner.

The cemetery, the village church and the wheat fields all lie within a stone's throw from each other. It was in the wheat fields that the artist painted his last work, Wheatfield with Crows, showing the birds suddenly taking flight above the golden ears of ripe wheat.

The tourists who now throng the village to a much greater extent than a decade ago, are drawn to the restored inn of Ravoux, now a museum. It contains the reconstructed room in which the artist died, but also has a gallery with van Gogh's works, and a restaurant.

The property, still a functioning bistro in the early 1980s, was put up for sale. In 1985 it was purchased by a Belgian businessperson who embarked on the task to restore the place to the tune of $8 million.

A passionate believer in his cause to ensure the inn a place in history, he raised most of the money among small investors in North America and Japan. Strong-headed locals objected, fearing "the defiling of a cathedral" when a false fireplace was removed from the building, which had been put there in the first place by Vincente Minnelli when he filmed Lust for Life, starring Kirk Douglas as Vincent van Gogh.

The Auberge Ravoux is open daily except Mondays, November to April, from 10 a.m. to 6:30 p.m. In the summer, hours are 10 a.m. to 8 p.m. It can be reached by train from the Gare St. Lazare in Paris, and day excursions can arranged by various tour operators in Paris.

American author tries to bridge the gap between the Talmud and the Internet

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

Is there a connection between the ancient Talmud and the contemporary web of electronic information known as the Internet?

Jonathan Rosen, novelist and culture editor of the English-language New York newspaper The Forward, has noted some interesting parallels between the two.

He wrote an essay on the subject which he later enlarged into a non-fiction book, The Talmud and the Internet: A Journey Between Worlds. The book is slated for publication by Farrar Straus Giroux in September.

"It's broad ranging, held together by a personal spin," the 36-year-old Yale-educated author explained recently. "There's something about the Internet – all those multiple texts vying for attention … some people find it disruptive.

Multiple texts vy for attention

"But the Talmud also has multiple texts vying for attention. The harmonized chaos of the Talmud may offer a key to understanding the multiplicity of voices and the tremendous wash of information that bombard us in the Internet age. The Talmud teaches us that the multiplicity of voices don't dilute us, they strengthen us."

An occasional contributor to the New York Times Magazine and the NYT's influential Book Review, Rosen works two days a week at The Forward, presiding over one of the most comprehensive and intelligent coverages of Jewish arts and letters anywhere.

His first novel, Eve's Apple was greeted with wide acclaim when it was published by Random House in 1997. Now he's under contract to produce another novel for next year; he's completed about a third of it.

Asked to define any current trends in Jewish literature in America, Rosen noted that The Forward began a century ago as a Yiddish daily geared to a huge readership of Jewish immigrants finding their way in America.

"It did its job very well because American Jews assimilated very well," he said. "It seems to me that the grandchildren and great-grandchildren of these immigrants are lost in a different way. Which is to say, they may be strangers to their own tradition, not strangers to America. The stories told by the great American-Jewish writers in years past involved the journey from immigrant origins to American belonging – it seemed as if that was the story, as if there were no other stories to tell.

"But the journey back must be as exciting as the journey out."

Saul Bellow, Henry Roth, Philip Roth and Bernard Malamud are among the venerated old guard of American Jewish writers who focused on the immigration-assimilation experience. Rising in their shadow is a new crop of American-Jewish writers, including Allegra Goodman, Rebecca Goldstein, Steve Stern and Nathan Englander, who are writing about Jewish culture from the inside, according to Rosen.

"Today's young (North) American Jews are immigrants of a different sort. They're lost inside Jewish culture. The journey back – it's a journey that America itself has made, back from an assimilationist ideal towards an embrace of ethnic particularity as a way of participating in the larger American whole."

American Jewish writers once faced an either-or proposition, Rosen said: "Either you were an American writer or you were a Jewish writer." But he contends that that's no longer the case. "There's so much hyphenated identity now that I don't think that one negates the other. I think that frees up writers a lot."

Business Profile

Lion Gate Films head dedicated to one goal: survival

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Jeff Sackman is the ultimate pragmatist.

"A good film is one that's profitable," he said. "A bad film is one that's not profitable. I try to be associated with good films."

By hewing assiduously to this tightly focused philosophy, Sackman, president of Toronto-based Lions Gate Films Corp., has been uncommonly successful.

In the past few years, the movies this publicly owned multi-media conglomerate has acquired and distributed – Dogma, American Psycho, Affliction and Gods and Monsters – have not only acquitted themselves respectfully or spectacularly at the box office, they have also garnered five Academy Awards nominations. In fact, The Red Violin won an Academy Award in the music category.

"Ultimately, what's important is running a successful business," observed Sackman, a casually attired, down-to-earth person who seems immune to pretension. "It's really no different than any other business. I recognize its glamour, though it's not so glamourous working until 11 o'clock at night."

Born and bred in Montreal, where his parents and siblings live, Sackman is something of an anomaly in a cutthroat business synonymous with Hollywood fizz and sparkle.

Not one to gravitate to the interminable round of cocktail parties and dinners which are de rigueur in the industry, Sackman keeps his nose to the grindstone and concentrates on the task at hand.

A workaholic who thinks nothing of crushing 80 to 90 hour weeks, Sackman is dedicated to one overriding Darwinian goal: sheer survival. In a dog-eat-dog environment where companies like his regularly emerge and disappear without a trace or murmur, Sackman's objective is simply to keep Lions Gate Films afloat, thriving and growing.

Since his appointment as president, he has kept stockholders reasonably happy. "We've been increasingly profitable," he said, declining to be more specific.

Three years ago, the company was acquired by Lions Gate Entertainment Corp., with its film, television, video and production facilities.

Sackman, who came aboard in 1991, was instrumental in orchestrating the sale of Lions Gate Films in 1997. Today he is responsible for all its activities, from acquisitions and sales to marketing and production.

"We're the only Canadian company to successfully operate in the U.S. distribution game," he noted. "We never went there with big expectations. Most people go there wanting to change the world."

With branches in Los Angeles, New York, Montreal and London, Lions Gate Films specializes in so-called "indies" rather than in studio movies. As a commentator recently put it, "Lions Gate Films has found a happy niche as an independent distributor."

Perhaps inevitably, it has been favourably compared to Miramax, the American outfit which has hammered its reputation on the anvil of films like Pulp Fiction, The English Patient, Shakespeare in Love and The Cider House Rules.

Sackman, however, dislikes the comparison. "We want to be ourselves, though we hope to be as successful as Miramax."

Like Miramax, Lions Gate Films embraces quality movies which appeal to dedicated filmgoers. "We won't get Harrison Ford in a movie and pretend to be Universal or Paramount," he quipped.

Sackman, whose wife Terri is an actress and a writer, grew up in Montreal's New Bordeaux neighborhood. His father, Mike, owns a wholesale paper products firm which employs his wife, Rhoda, and their son, Brian. Sackman's sister, Mallary, is in charge of Ben Gurion University's Montreal office.

After graduating from Lower Canada College, he studied at Vanier College and then at McGill University, where he received a bachelor of commerce degree.

While prepping for an MBA degree at Syracuse University, he took a variety of film courses. Movies have always fascinated him, but Sackman said his taste for film was whetted by a trip to Hollywood as a teenager and a meeting there with a cousin who was a big shot in the industry.

When he finished his studies in Syracuse, Sackman drove to Toronto in search of a job. Riffling through the Yellow Pages, his eye caught Cineplex Odeon Films, of which he had heard. He snagged an interview with its legendary and irascible president, Garth Drabinsky. Sackman eventually landed a position, and stayed for six years.

Under Drabinsky's tutelage, he mastered every facet of the business, from distribution to acquisition. "I worked hard. No job was too small."

From Drabinsky, whose financial woes have been the stuff of newspaper headlines of late, Sackman learned an important lesson which he has not forgotten. "There is an absolute correlation between what you put in and what you achieve," he mused.

At Cineplex, Sackman rose through the ranks, becoming vice-president in 1988. The cutting-edge films he acquired and marketed were, among others, The Piano, The Crying Game, My Left Foot and Sex, Lies and Videotape.

Since 1995, he has also been the executive producer and producer of more than 20 films, notably Buffalo 66, Dog Park, Jerry and Tom, and Deadly Currents (Simcha Jacobovici's Genie Award-winning documentary about the intifada, the 1987-1993 Palestinian uprising in the territories).

Currently, he is developing eight movies, four of which are scheduled to be released this year. Lions Gate Films spends about $50 million annually on the production and co-production of features.

Sackman likes movies which "cut through the clutter and are unique." But personally, he is drawn to escapist fare. At one point, he saw as many as 500 films a year, but lately he has had no time for more than about 100.

He enjoys the perks of the trade – the Academy Awards ceremony in Los Angeles and the Cannes Film Festival. But at the end of the day, you will usually find him at his desk, working from morning to night.

"I'm totally consumed," he acknowledged. "You have to be in this business. It's in my blood. It's another layer of skin."

Teen lobbies for no-smoking bylaw

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

VAUGHAN — Simon Strelchik, 17, is on a mission to get York Region to butt out.

The Grade 12 student at Westmount Collegiate Institute is founder and executive director of Youth Fighting Tobacco, a group of about 10 high school students dedicated to having all public indoor places in the region become smoke free.

At present, smoking is permitted in public places such as restaurants and the workplace, unless a specific location has its own policy.

Strelchik, a member of the youth advisory board of York Region Health Services, says that he has gone from door to door collecting signatures for a petition urging regional counsellors to vote for a no-smoking bylaw, and in one day at school collected 150 names from students. "People are eager to sign the petition. Most thought it was a good idea.

"Even the smokers were signing. I had some people sign the petition with a cigarette in their hand. They think that it may help them quit smoking if they are not allowed to smoke in restaurants and other public places. They understand that smoking is dangerous, and they do not want to impose their bad habits on other people," said Strelchik.

At the start of the school year, he said, he did a survey of students at his school, and it showed that 75 percent of them supported a no-smoking bylaw. "They realize that people should not be forced to be exposed to second-hand smoke."

Surrounding municipalities such as Toronto, Mississauga, Caledon and Waterloo have no smoking bylaws, said Strelchik. "The bottom line is that there used to be smoking everywhere, and some places were able to change that. It is the businesses here that are opposed to the bylaw. They know that in the short term, their business will be affected. Long term, however, there should be no difference."

Youth Fighting Tobacco held three public meetings this past winter, and they held a rally before one meeting in Richmond Hill. "A lot of people showed up. We told them how smoking affects workers and how the bylaw will help smokers. One member talked about his father who has had a heart attack due to smoking," said Strelchik.

"The people at the meeting really paid attention to us. The businesses were silenced. I think they were overshadowed; we gave a fresh perspective to things," he said.

A no-smoking bylaw is coming, said Strelchik. "Some counsellors are adamant about it and have been very encouraging. It is in our hands; we just need to mobilize enough support. If people call their counsellor and get involved, then it is a definite possibility."

He is also involved in the Youth Tobacco Coalition, a group that holds meetings in Toronto. "As opposed to the York Region group, which is more about legislation, the coalition runs workshops for youth about the dangers of smoking.

Strelchik, who sees politics in his future, says he is proud to be making a difference. "More people are becoming aware of the no-smoking issue because of us."

Respect is the key to all relationships

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Understanding another person's point of view is the key to a respectful relationship says Vera Held, an educator and communications expert.

"You do not have to approve or accept; you just need to understand," she says.

Held, author of How Not to Take it Personally: 10 Action Strategies for Communications Success (VNH Communications) says that people who take the time "to hear the other guy out show an underlying generosity of spirit. That should be the premise of all relationships."

Vera Held

Unlike breathing, she says, listening is a mental process. "You must first make a decision to listen, then use your good listening habits to do so. It does not come naturally, it is not an automatic reflex and certainly, not everyone knows how to listen.

"It has nothing to do with intelligence. Good listeners want to listen, and they make, and take, the time to do so."

As well, she says, listening and hearing are different things. "Hearing acuity and good listening are not related. A person may hear well and not be such a good listener, or indeed, may be a poor listener."

If there was more respect in the workplace, productivity would increase tremendously, she says. "Many employers pay lip service to their employees; they do not really listen. The employees then become frustrated because no one is listening to them. Employees are often kept on a short leash so they do not step out of line. All these things squash creativity."

Creative ideas are fostered, she says, when employees feel respected. "When people leave work they should not feel like a shmatta, but unfortunately, that is what is going on. A lot of this is not from the work itself, but from the interpersonal relationships in the workplace. Productivity is hampered when a worker feels slighted by something someone says to them."

Dr. Barry Winter receives Distinguished Service Award

TORONTO — Dr. Barry Winter is the recipient of the Ontario Association of Optometrists' 2000 Distinguished Service Award.

Honoured for almost 30 years of outstanding service to the visual welfare of others and the profession of optometry, Winter was given the award by the Ontario Association of Optometrists (OAO) president, Brian Lockyer, during the recent OAO Annual Symposium in Hamilton.

Winter, of Etobicoke, is also the treasurer of the Jewish Camp Council. He has spent much of his career advocating for the rights of individual optometric practitioners.

He has served both as a member of the Council of the College of Optometrists (COO), the body that deals with complaints against optometrists, and as chair of the OAO resource committee, which advises optometrists facing legal problems relating to practice. He has become an expert witness in cases involving optometric practice.

"The public, the profession of optometry, and the community have profited greatly from Dr. Barry Winter's dedication," Lockyer said. "He is a great believer in individual rights."

"It is an honour to receive this award," Winter says. "It's satisfying to know that my work has made a difference."

After graduating from the Ontario College of Optometry in 1965, Ottawa-born Winter opened private practice in Etobicoke.

Israel's golden boys in blue finally win tournament

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Israeli national hockey team has finally done it. After eight years of woulda', coulda' and shoulda', the boys in blue put their checkered past behind them, exorcised old demons, stared down old rivals and finally won a gold medal in International Ice Hockey Federation (IIHF) Pool D competition.

The Israelis went undefeated in the IIHF tournament, held recently in Reykjavik, Iceland, and despite a couple of scares in games against Iceland and Belgium, they refused to let a little adversity stand in their way.

This time there were no late game giveaways to leave them short, no botched calls by IIHF referees to deprive them of key goals, nothing to spoil the party and ruin their exultation at finally, finally playing up to their full potential and winning it all.

Paul Rosen, the Toronto-based general manager of the nationals, said the team had good reason to feel confident going into the tournament. Last year, the Israelis finished second and they were close to winning the gold.

This year's team was loaded with talent and "when we left Canada, we thought we had our best team ever. We had talented forwards who could've played in the B Pool," Rosen said.

Leading the Israelis up front were Max Bierbraer, a Kazakhstan-born forward who plays for Newmarket Hurricanes and who this summer may be one of the few players ever (other than Danius Zubrus) to be drafted by the NHL out of Tier II Junior A; Sergei Zak, a Russian-born forward who played last season in Division 1 in Sweden; and Alon Eizenman, an all-star centre with Penn State in the American College Hockey Association.

Backstopping the Israelis was goaltender Yevgeni Gusin, who had brief stints in the East Coast Hockey League and in the Colonial Hockey League.

Eleven skaters with Israeli passports flew to Iceland from Canada to join the Israelis, Rosen said.

The team enjoyed only one practice prior to their first game, a barn-burner against the host Icelanders. The rink was full of enthusiastic fans, including the country's president, and it felt like playoff hockey, Rosen recounted.

Israel jumped into a 3-0 lead but saw that margin whittled away on three fairly weak goals given up by Gusin. With the scored tied, coach Sergei Matin pulled Gusin and inserted Sergei Ostrovski between the pipes. That seemed to settle down the team and they went on to a 6-3 victory, said Erez Eizenman, a centre with the CHAT Tigers high school team, who joined the Israelis in Iceland.

Game two saw Israel face off against Turkey, one of the weakest teams on the international scene. After jumping into a 15-0 lead, Israel went on cruise control and still managed to outshoot the Turks 64-0. Gusin reportedly was seen in the mezzanine level enjoying a cup of coffee while the forwards played Hearts on the bench.

Rosen reports the game was not the most lop-sided contest he's aware of. In 1997, Kazakhstan, led by Nik Antropov, beat Iceland 72-1 in Under-18 junior action. Antropov, now a Toronto Maple Leaf, collected 39 points in that game.

The two victories in preliminary games put Israeli into the medal round against Australia and arch-rivals, Belgium. Belgium kicked off the medal round by defeating Australia 7-3.

Israel then faced off against Belgium and more or less dominated. They did just about everything right, Eizenman said.

"We definitely had the best skill in the tournament," he said. By that time, his brother Alon had joined the team from Penn State and was centring the big line with Zak and Bierbraer.

The Belgians had a few pro players from Holland and the game was competitive. Nevertheless, the Israelis, particularly, the big line, controlled the play.

"We had so many scoring chances," Eizenman said. Israel had numerous two on ones and even some two on none breaks but the forwards "overpassed the puck" and sometimes didn't even get a shot on goal.

Despite strong goaltending by the Belgians, Israel managed to score one goal. They held on until the 19:50 mark of the third period when the Belgians bounced the puck towards Gusin, who'd been strong in the Israeli net, and scored on a goalmouth scramble.

With no overtime, the game ended 1-1.

Naturally, the Israelis were in shock after the tie, but they collected themselves and geared up for the task at hand. To win the gold medal, they knew they had to beat Australia by at least four goals and score more than seven, Rosen said. The game started badly for Israel when Australia jumped into a 1-0 lead on a goal by Vladimir Rubin, a Czech Jew who now resides Down Under.

But instead of folding, the Israelis battled back. Israel's top line poured it on and outskated the Australians badly – as they'd done all tournament long. Their puck-cycling was unstoppable and it powered the Israelis into a 7-1, second period lead.

Israel padded its lead to 9-1 and held on for a 9-3 victory.

Zak had four goals in the game, Bierbraer had two. Bierbraer was named the tournament's top forward, while Zak won the scoring title with 12 goals and four assists. Bierbraer was second with six goals and six assists, and according to Rosen, "was more dominant."

As far as Eizenman is concerned, the victory "was amazing. I was the youngest player [18] and the only one who hadn't played [with the senior nationals] before. Sergei Zak was almost crying on the bench and everyone was so ecstatic. It was a great feeling to win it and hear Hatikvah after. It was just amazing."

"It was a great experience and it was really emotional to be on the blueline and represent your country," Rosen added.

Orgil was one of the originals – a member of Israel's first national team in 1992. "It's different winning it at 34 after starting in my 20s. Now I know what the old veterans in the NHL feel like. You appreciate it more."

Under normal circumstances, Israel's win would have vaulted them into C Pool next year but the IIHF is re-organizing its divisions. Next season the IIHF will feature a Division 1 with 20 teams and a Division 2 with 12 teams. Rosen believes that if Israel retains most of its key players, it can win gold again in Division 2.

Joining the team from Canada this year were: Bierbraer, Ostrovski, Ron Soreanu, Ron Berman (North York Rangers), the Eizenman brothers, Yaron Orgil (Drexel University), Oded Orgil, Shawn Frydberg, all of Toronto, and Dan Mizrahi and Shlomo Levy of Montreal.

Hitchcock heading to Metulla

For the Hitchcock family, participating in the hockey school seemed a perfect fit. "The Jewish community in Dallas is very strong and our family has become very active in the community," he said. The children attend Jewish supplementary school three days a week and the family enjoys a strong attachment to the State of Israel. When the opportunity arose to visit Israel as a family, they jumped at it. They plan to visit Tel Aviv and Jerusalem and other sites both before and after the camp, Hitchcock said.

"It's something that everyone in the family is really looking forward to do. To me, the culture is the thing I'm really interested in," said Hitchcock, who led the Stars to a Stanley Cup victory last year. "I'm in the people business, so any time I can intermingle with the people of another culture, that's something I look forward to.

"I think the kids and Nancy are keen on the historical aspect of it. It really is the homeland...We're viewing it as a once in a lifetime experience."

The camp was co-founded by Philadelphia Flyers head coach Roger Neilson, by Starkman, a goalie coach at Neilson's Lindsay, Ont.-based camp, and by Jeff Budd of Kitchener, Ont., who worked at Canada Centre for several years.

They hope to bring to Israel 34 Canadian and American youngsters (aged 14-20) – up from 19 last year – to join about 50 sabra skaters. One question mark continues to be Neilson's participation. The Flyers' head coach has been diagnosed with a rare form of bone marrow cancer. Neilson has undergone chemotherapy and recently received a bone marrow transplant.

In each of the camp's three years, an NHL player has rounded out the teaching staff. Bill Lindsay, Danius Zubrus and last year, Steve Dubinsky, who is Jewish, have participated. Starkman said he has several NHLers in mind for the 2000 camp but "usually NHLers are not ready to commit until after the season."

Fees for the two-week camp and related tours and programs runs for $1,795 plus airfare. A four-week program that includes the hockey camp and two weeks of touring sells for $3,795 plus airfare.

Downtown Jam comes uptown

By JOYCE SINGER-D'APRILE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Andrew Hall's claim to fame used to be that he was Monty Hall's nephew.

Then one day, frustrated that he had nowhere suitable to go in Toronto to jam on his drums with his buddies, he came up with an original idea. He envisioned a club that was accessible, clean, and well-stocked with instruments and the latest in sound-recording technology. In other words, a studio that would appeal to jammers like himself.

Hall is now making a name for himself with his Downtown Jam club for amateur musicians. He calls it a "health club," since it caters to the well-being of their musical souls.

He's not claiming that any of his club members should quit their day jobs to become professional musicians, Hall says, laughing. "That'll never happen. Bill Gates has a better chance of catching up on his e-mail!"

Hall is proud to be able to match up amateur musicians with others of their musical calibre. Many of these wannabe Janice Joplins and Frank Zappas grew up playing in high school garage bands of the '60s and '70s.

They're not just run-of-the-mill jammers, Hall says, but successful, white-collar types. Club members range from surgeons to stockbrokers to single mothers, who all have a blast reliving their musical past at the downtown jam studio on Richmond Street.

On April 13, the Downtown Jam club played its third concert for charity, rocking the beautifully refurbished Capital Theatre in uptown Toronto.

Hall says that for each concert, they pick a different charity and donate a portion of the proceeds. The recent concert raised money for the Shout Clinic, which provides free medical services for homeless street youth.

The concert was a hit with the audience, which consisted mainly of family, friends and coworkers, who partied up a storm, dancing away the evening, he says.

This is not always the stuff of great music, or even very good music. But the performers score points for enthusiasm and chutzpah, if not finesse. Kudos go to producer Hall for providing them with a special place to jam with their new pals, and then showcasing their efforts at a fund-raising gig.

Sprinkle coffee liqueur on angel food cake and set aside. For custard, combine pudding mix with half and half and chill.
Whip cream with coffee granules. Add sugar and vanilla until soft peaks form. Combine chilled custard with cake, tossing gently.

About Seniors

By DR. MARK CLARFIELD

Although I am a doctor and as much as I love them – I have fought a long and more or less successful battle against becoming the family doctor in my own family.

And as a physician, I know that I am not alone in struggling with this dilemma – not because we don't value our older relatives and certainly not because we don't want to help out.

The reason is, simply put, fear. The medical practitioner is afraid that since the family are so near and dear to us, our judgment might be impaired if we acted as their physician.

Of course, in an emergency, most MDs would do whatever is necessary. For myself, I have on occasion gently steered family members away from certain operations and diagnostic procedures when my advice was sought. Most physicians have looked in their own children's ears and occasionally, albeit reluctantly, I have prescribed antibiotics for my offspring.

Research investigating the circumstances under which doctors have treated family indicated that many physicians indeed acted sensibly. But surprisingly, in a multitude of cases, it also provided evidence of a far more interventionistic approach to one's near and dear than seems wise.

The interesting question as to whether the care provided relatives was actually inferior to that given other patients was addressed. The authors do not venture an opinion but state (perhaps tongue in cheek) that "comparative process and outcome evaluations of care provided to patients who are family members and to those who are not would provide a more complete assessment of the quality of care."

Concerns about a physician's professional relationship with family are not new. For example, south of the border back in 1901, the American Medical Association stated that a family member's illness "tends to obscure [the physician's] judgment and produces timidity and irresolution in practice." And not much has changed over the ensuing decades.

What should a physician do if, despite the best laid plans of mice, men, mothers-in-law and medicine, close relatives call at ungodly hours describing strange symptoms?

First, establish that the situation is not urgent and deal with it if so. In most cases, however, the physician would be well advised to tell a close family member to "take two aspirins and call your doctor in the morning."

In 113 years of safety leadership, this is possibly our finest 2.7 seconds.

► M-CLASS. In 1886, after giving the world the automobile, Mercedes-Benz set out on a century of innovation, with safety at the top of our priorities.

► Imagine our pride then, when, out of fifteen midsize SUV's crash-tested by the Insurance Institute for Highway Safety, the Mercedes M-Class received the highest overall rating: the "Best Pick" commendation.

► The M-Class was praised by the Institute for how well the passenger compartment was preserved with little or no intrusion. In part, this is thanks to the M-Class' special, additional crumple zone around the windshield pillars, which can actually help dissipate some of the crash energy around the side of the vehicle.

► In fact, the crumple zone, ABS and the airbag are just some of the many Mercedes-Benz innovations that became industry standards. Proven time and again, these innovations help make the M-Class, with more safety systems than any other SUV, the safety leader it is.

Jewish Lt.-Gov. named in N.S.

By JOEL JACOBSON
Atlantic Correspondent

HALIFAX — Nova Scotia has its first female and first Jewish lieutenant-governor in one neat package.

Myra Freeman, Saint John, N.B.-born, but a Halifax resident since her days at Dalhousie University in the 1960s, will assume the vice-regal post before the end of May.

Myra Freeman

A teacher by profession, Freeman has been a strong community worker, both in the secular and Jewish sectors, and was a major worker in the leadership and national election campaign for Prime Minister Jean Chrétien.

For the last several months her name has been mentioned, with several others including Halifax volunteer Ruth Goldbloom, as a strong candidate to replace James Kinley as the Queen's representative in Nova Scotia.

"I really couldn't imagine being chosen," she told The CJN. "There were lots of names out there. It's the prime minister's decision. It could have been anyone."

Held in high regard by her peers, she is chair of the Atlantic Canada Women's Division of United Jewish Appeal, was small community co-chair for Canadian Jewish Congress, and was on the national executive of CJC.

She is a member of Hadassah, and also chaired the social hall renovation committee of the Beth Israel Synagogue where she served on the education committee.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Senator Retires

OTTAWA — Ron Ghitter, one of a handful of Jewish senators, announced his retirement recently after serving for seven years in the upper chamber. A Calgary-born lawyer, Ghitter, 64, served as provincial MLA for eight years in the 1970s. Ghitter consistently stressed human concerns and was a vocal opponent of the prosecution of Alberta schoolteacher and Holocaust denier James Keegstra.

Holocaust Tools

VANCOUVER — Teachers in British Columbia will have new tools to teach the Holocaust next year. Canadian Jewish Congress, Pacific region, the Vancouver Holocaust Education Centre and the Ministry of Education have put together two educational packages on the Holocaust to be available in the public school system for the grades 6 and 11 social studies curriculum.

Prof. Gets Top Prize

TORONTO — Prof. Paul Brumer of the University of Toronto has been awarded the prestigious Killam Prize, one of the world's top scientific prizes. Brumer is best known for his contributions in the area of theoretical chemical physics. The prize, one of three won by U of T professors, was awarded this week at the National Gallery of Canada in Ottawa in a ceremony presided over by Gov. Gen. Adrienne Clarkson.

ISRAEL

Ethiopians Protest

JERUSALEM — Several hundred members of Israel's Ethiopian community demonstrated outside the Prime Minister's Office last week, demanding that Israel allow the immediate immigration of relatives waiting in Ethiopia. Israeli Interior Minister Natan Sharansky recently promised to adopt measures to speed up the review of applications.

War-Era Reunion

JERUSALEM — The chairman of the board of the Yad Vashem Holocaust Memorial here was reunited with the grandson of a Polish couple that hid his family during World War II. The grandson contacted Shevach Weiss after seeing the Yad Vashem executive and former speaker of the Knesset appear on Polish television.

WORLD

Church Apologizes

VILNIUS — The Lithuanian Catholic Church apologized last month for its passivity during the Holocaust and its failure to dissuade believers from collaborating with Nazis during World War II. Lithuania has recently come under fire from several Jewish organizations and the U.S. Justice Department for moving slowly in prosecuting two alleged Nazi collaborators.

Murder Arrests

NEW YORK — New Jersey police have arrested two men in the 1994 murder-for-hire of the wife of a prominent local rabbi. The men were charged with murder and conspiracy to murder Carol Neulander. Her husband, Rabbi Fred Neulander, was indicted in January 1999 on charges of conspiracy to commit murder. He is free on bail awaiting his trial, which is scheduled to begin in June.

Jews Targeted

MOSCOW — Russian neo-Nazis are again targeting a Jewish community in the northwestern part of the country, according to reports from Jewish organizations. Last week, a car owned by the security chief of Borovichi's synagogue was set on fire and swastikas were drawn on the cars of two local Jewish leaders who were celebrating Passover inside the synagogue.

Greek Campaign

ATHENS — Greece's Jewish community is launching a campaign to raise about $1 million to save its remaining synagogues and cemeteries, some of which have been vandalized recently. Jewish leaders say they are facing government indifference to the problem and plan to seek assistance abroad.

Former Labourers Urged to Apply for Funds

NEW YORK — The Conference on Jewish Material Claims Against Germany says application forms for payments to former slave and forced labourers will be short, simple and non-bureaucratic.

Applicants should apply directly to the Claim Conference. There is no fee.

In March, Germany announced a fund of $4 billion in restitution for Nazi-era forced and slave labourers.

A slave labourer is defined as a person who was in a concentration camp or ghetto, or under comparable conditions of confinement during World War II, and who was forced to work. Former slave labourers who meet the eligibility requirements may receive up to 15,000 deutschmarks.

A forced labourer is defined as a person who was forced to work during World War II but is not included in the definition of a slave labourer. Former forced labourers may receive up to 5,000 deutschmarks.

The final amounts paid may be less than these sums, depending on the number of people who are eligible.

There will be no reduction of payments for persons who received compensation or restitution under other programs. Persons who received payments for slave and/or forced labour from a private industry fund, either recently or in the past, will have such payments deducted from the payment to be received under this initiative.

Former slave and forced labourers alive on Feb. 16, 1999, will be eligible to apply for payments. In the event that a former slave or forced labourer passed away after Feb. 16, 1999, his or her legal heirs will be entitled to apply for payment.

For more information, contact the Conference on Jewish Material Claims, 15 E. 26th St., suite 906, New York, N.Y., 10010, or call 212-696-4944, fax: 212-679-2126.

Ont. budget studied for special needs funds

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A section in last week's Ontario budget which calls for public funding of the medical requirements of special needs students at religious-based schools was greeted by Jewish communal leaders with confusion but cautious optimism.

The small paragraph, contained on page 13 of the budget, read: "Through the Ministry of Health, we are delivering on our promise by proposing to extend funding for the medical requirements of special needs students in all denominational schools. This will eliminate unfair barriers for special needs children seeking a faith-based education. It is the fair and equitable thing to do."

But there was no dollar amount accompanying the item in the budget or in supporting documents, leaving Canadian Jewish Congress to speculate that the Tories were simply reannouncing an old expenditure of between $2 and $3 million a year to provide independent schools with medically-based health services already available in public schools.

After a day of feverishly working the phones, Congress was able to ascertain, from officials in the finance ministry, that $7 million has been allocated for health services in private schools for the 2000-2001 fiscal year, and $11 million for 2001-2002.

Still, Congress greeted the announcement by saying it was "pleased but puzzled."

Pleased because it marked the first time the government has addressed a long-standing priority in the Jewish community.

And puzzled because the money is being allocated to the health ministry and not the education ministry, meaning funds will be targeted to a small subset of children with specific medical needs.

'I believe in you'

From the editor's desk

One moves slowly, solemnly almost reverentially through the rooms specially arranged to house the new exhibition at the Art Gallery of Ontario (AGO). In the muted light of the chambers, one is soon struck by the unmistakable feeling that here is a special place.

The work on display is that of Charlotte Salomon, a young Jewish artist from Germany who was killed in Auschwitz in 1943.

It is also Salomon's life on display. And even a great deal more than that.

The exhibition is titled Life? or Theatre?, the name the artist herself gave to the extraordinary collection. The collection is a multi-media experience anchored in some 1,300 raw, sometimes-jarring-sometimes tender, but always startling, gouache watercolour paintings that tell the melancholy autobiographical tale of the young artist, her family, her country and her people. Of the 1,300 paintings that comprise the total collection, nearly 400 hang at the AGO.

Charlotte Salomon
Life? or Theatre?

But Life? or Theatre? is more than a series of paintings. It was intended by the artist to be a Singespiel, a play with music, a mini operetta, if you will.

And remarkably, this is what Salomon achieved.

The paintings are arranged chronologically as if they were each single frames in a reel of film. Advancing from one drawing to the next, therefore, is akin to advancing the film, moving further along in the storyline told by the artist/author.

Because there is a story, there are also characters, narrative, plot, dialogue and even monologue incorporated into the meticulously painted, serialized frames of this rare watercolour "film."

And there is also music. Young Charlotte carefully scripted a medley of classical works to accompany her drawings. To the great credit of AGO the exhibit includes an audio capability that recreates much of artist's intention.

The design and dimension of the collection are captivating; it is a unique, brilliantly creative effort at transcending the linear, two-dimensional world of drawing and painting into something vastly more complex.

Emotions flare not only by dint of colour and hue, texture and tone, but by "lyric" and narrative and melody as well.

The many layers of Life? or Theatre? beckon the observer. There is so much unravelling and peeling back, so much delving through the story and through the myriad artforms that Charlotte has placed before us, that the experience is as much "archeological" as it is artistic.

With the urgency borne of the time, of the frightening uncertainly that she faced each morning as dawn broke over the blood-red horizon, Charlotte raced to chronicle on the pages of her watercolours, the details of the collapsing civilization whose destructive rubble increasingly crumbled around her. In just over two years, she completed more than 1,300 drawings.

Standing before the drawings, one tries to imagine oneself inside the pictures, where there is little light but an abiding beauty. One dares even to imagine oneself inside the very soul of an artist who could design a form of moral order out of moral disintegration.

"May you never forget that I believe in you," Charlotte's teacher and friend Alfred Wolfsohn wrote to her before her 21st birthday, as she departed Germany in 1938 for her temporary refuge in the south of France.

She must have painted in a fury of urgent mission. Undoubtedly, it was to affirm Wolfsohn's and her own belief in both the goodness and the importance of her life. In so doing, she affirmed the goodness and the importance of every life.

On Sept. 24, 1943, the Gestapo arrived. Charlotte and her husband were dragged out of the house and thrown into the truck. Charlotte was then four months pregnant. On Oct. 7 they were transported to Auschwitz. On their arrival, Oct. 10, 1943, Charlotte was killed. She was 26 years old. Her husband was killed on Jan. 1, 1944.

Parents should bring their children, and teachers should bring their students to this remarkable exhibition.

Charlotte Salomon's belief in the ultimate goodness and importance of life is the true story of her Singespiel. It is a story we can never hear or see too often.

Life? or Theatre? is at the AGO until July 9. MBD

Israel Funwalk is for runners also

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Adults who don't have young children have a new incentive to participate in this year's UJA FEDERATION Israel Funwalk.

An adult run has been added, along the first five km of the seven-km route through old Jewish Toronto. Runners will start out five minutes before the walk begins from Nathan Phillips Square. The route finishes at Ontario Place, with three checkpoints along the way including Grange Park and Bellevue Square.

The event, which usually attracts up to 10,000 people, will take place on Sunday, May 28 at 10:30 a.m., with registration from 9:15.

Traditionally the walk, an annual event for over 30 years, has been directed at young families, said Harvey Cooperberg, who is co-chairing the event with Fran Grundman.

For Cooperberg and his wife Maura, a former chair of the event, the funwalk is still a family affair. Son Lorne, 18, and daughter Erin, 15, will serve as walk marshals.

The adult run is aimed at attracting new participants, said Cooperberg. He anticipates "a great day for everyone, a great festival afterward, with lots of music and lots of fun."

The festival will include a kosher barbecue and entertainment by Beat Borscht, a student klezmer band. Mandell Entertainment Group Amusements is providing carnival rides at Nathan Phillips Square and dancers at one of the checkpoints.

For the second consecutive year, a clothing drive will be held for the Just A Second Shop affiliated with Jewish Family & Child Service. Runners and walkers are encouraged to bring new or gently used clothing to donate.

Although participants can register until the last minute, a number of prizes are offered for sponsorship money received before this Friday, May 12. For every $30 raised before Friday, participants will receive a pass to Ontario Place valid on the day of the walk, and T-shirts, while supplies last. Those raising $60 by the deadline will be eligible to win two tickets to Israel courtesy of El Al. Funds collected will be directed to this year's UJA Federation campaign.

For further information, call 416-631-5700 or refer to the funwalk Web site at www.jewishtoronto.net/funwalk2000.

Holocaust's victims mourned, survivors honored

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — One of Inge Spitz's bitterest childhood memories of life under the Nazis was when the local grocer stopped giving her candy because she was a Jew.

Addressing nearly 2,000 people assembled at Earl Bales Park, Spitz said her first memories of the Nazi regime are of her grandfather's arrest around 1936. He soon died of pneumonia because, as a Jew, he could not be admitted to the local hospital.

Born in Potsdam, Spitz was just six years old when Adolf Hitler came to power. She and her sister were the only Jews at the school.

They both left for France in 1939 with a Kindertransport. Spitz lived in a convent using false identity papers. In 1944, she and nine other children slipped under barbed wire into the relative safety of Switzerland.

Joseph Peretz of Toronto was the only survivor of his family, having escaped from a forced-labour camp in France, where he spent two years. Under Nazi occupation in his native Antwerp, he was subject to anti-Jewish laws and curfews, and witnessed a synagogue being destroyed by a crowd of locals "in an orgy of desecration," while police stood by.

He too recalled memories of arrests and deportations, and of Jewish property being shipped to Germany in trains labeled "Gift from the Belgian population."

Yom Hashoah

A cold, damp wind blew through the giant tent erected for the solemn annual service. Six candles were kindled, one each in memory of the six million Jewish victims of the Holocaust and the 1.5 million children who perished; and one each for the children of survivors, for partisans and resistance fighters, for the Allied forces, and for the Righteous Among the Nations.

Students from several Jewish day schools recited excerpts about the Holocaust and the final declaration issued by thousands of Holocaust survivors who gathered in Israel in 1981.

Members of the Jewish War Veterans of Canada and the General Wingate Branch 256 of the Royal Canadian Legion marched the colours. Greetings on behalf of Israel were brought by Consul General Meir Romem.

Dramatic readings and songs were rendered in Yiddish and English.

Premier Mike Harris and Hank Rosenbaum, chair of the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem, flank Holocaust survivor Olly Mittleman, one of 13 survivors honored at Queen's Park last week for contributions to Ontario.

Rabbi Moshe Stern said Kaddish, while Cantor Aaron Bensoussan recited K'El Maleh Rachamim and led the singing of Zog Nit Keynmol, the Partisans' Song.

The next day at Queen's Park, the provincial government and the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem honored 13 Holocaust survivors who have made positive contributions to Ontario.

Premier Mike Harris and Helen Johns, minister of culture and citizenship, joined Hank Rosenbaum, chair of the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem, for the ninth annual reception attended by friends and family of the honourees.

Handed specially inscribed scrolls were artist Dubi Arie; former school trustee and community activist Elsa Chandler; Cantors Martin Rosenblum and Joseph Cooper; volunteer Sally Eisner; Olly Mittleman; Betty and Izzy Kirshenbaum, who were both aboard the Exodus; the late communal leader Ralph Snow; and businessmen Morris Leider, Izzy Light, Jerry Matta and Max Moneta.

Minutes later in the legislature, Willowdale Tory MPP David Young rose to pay tribute to the honourees, who were in the visitors' gallery, and to speak about the importance of remembering the Holocaust.

"As a youngster, I grew up in a community where it was common for adults to have numbers tattooed on their arms. These marks remain as painful reminders of the concentration camps, and of a tyrant's maniacal attempt to eliminate a people.

"We must continue our vigil to ensure that no tyrant will ever again inflict such unspeakable suffering on any group of human beings, regardless of their race, religion, or way of life, wherever they may live," Young stated.

More than 400 people attended a Yom Hashoah service on April 30 at Beth Radom Congregation, which was sponsored by The Canadian Holocaust Remembrance Association. Special emphasis was placed on Canada's contributions to the defeat of Nazism.

Also last week, Canadian Jewish Congress praised the governments of Manitoba and British Columbia for passing legislation officially marking Holocaust Memorial Day in those provinces.

The provinces join New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island, Quebec and Ontario, where legislation has been enacted to mark Yom Hashoah as a day of Holocaust remembrance.

As well, B'nai Brith Canada's League for Human Rights last week unveiled its Yom Hashoah teacher's guide, which lists resources, tips, Web sites and bibliographies for teachers.

The guide will be distributed widely across Ontario for the 2000-2001 school year.

Recognize the suffering of others, says Holocaust survivor

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — "I saw it. I lived it. I survived it."

With these simple words, Holocaust survivor Michael Stivelman confided why he felt compelled to write The Death March, an account of his wartime experiences.

Yom Hashoah

The book, originally published in Portuguese under the name A Marcha, was a bestseller in Brazil, where Stivelman now lives. It was recently published in English.

Stivelman launched the book at a Yom Hashoah program at Chabad@Flamingo, The Ernest Manson Lubavitch Centre, in Thornhill.

He said that while he himself was not in a concentration camp, he wanted to give first-hand testimony about what happened to him, his family and his village, and by extension, to the Jews of Europe under Hitler.

"I was not just reliving my private hell," he said. "I was giving one microscopic example of what the Nazis did."

When the Nazis came to Bessarabia, instead of putting the members of his community into camps, they rounded them up and made them march through the countryside until they died of malnutrition or disease, he said. Some were executed.

Stivelman said he was saved by an "Orthodox Ukrainian woman," one of the three miracles of his life; the other two were meeting his wife Rachel and returning to religious observance.

When the war ended, he found that his entire paternal family had been wiped out. He immigrated to Brazil, where his mother's family had been since the early years of the century.

He became an economist and president of Banco Cedula S/A in Rio de Janeiro, married and had two children. He never spoke about the war years.

Eventually, though, he came to the conclusion that "by my silence, I failed to honour those who didn't survive. I decided to bare my soul."

The biblical injunction, Zachor v'al tishkach – Remember and don't forget (what Amalek did to you), is not for the purpose of looking for pity, he stressed. "It is to denounce oppression and injustice. We must remember our suffering, so that it won't happen to anyone else."

In response to a question from the audience, Stivelman said that Jews as a people have to take an "ethical stance." Just because world nations didn't speak out or help the Jews during World War II, "that doesn't change our responsibility as Jews to fight against any injustice – not only against Jews, but against Blacks, the poor, Gypsies."

We should "extend the same ethical sense of justice that we feel towards Jews to non-Jews," Stivelman said.

That is not just empty rhetoric for Stivelman. All proceeds from the sale of A Marcha/The Death March are going to a foundation that will help both Jews and non-Jews in Brazil. "I was accepted there, and my children were born there," he explained.

Rabbi Mendel Kaplan, spiritual leader of Chabad@Flamingo, said that when the Torah exhorts us to remember Amalek, it is not talking merely about a couple of ancient feuding nations.

Rather, it refers to a "cold indifference" – not caring about what is happening to other people.

"The Torah tells us to come to shul once a year to remember that being a Jew means something."

It is our responsibility, he said, "to be moved, to not allow ourselves to be indifferent" to other people or to the obligations and responsibilities of Jewish observance, such as saying Kiddush, going to shul and observing Pesach.

The program included excerpts from the Oscar-winning documentary The Long Way Home, about the liberation of the concentration camps by the Allied forces.

DANNY SHIMONI, Optimistic Attitude

On the fourth day of the war in Lebanon, 22 year old Danny Shimoni's tank was hit twice by Syrian anti-tank missiles ...

"It is very difficult today to describe the pain" says Danny. "My legs were crushed and the heat from the explosion was an unbearable 3000C". Danny chose to fight and did not allow himself to lose consciousness. "I felt very close to death, and I thought about my mother — I had to make sure that I stayed alive."

Danny lost both his legs and needed numerous operations. He was unable to work due to his terrible injuries, and became very restless.

Today, with the help of Beit Halochem, Danny says his injuries seem almost natural. "Although," he adds, "an injury is something that stays with you for the rest of your life. I think about it when I get dressed in the morning, when I get tired and at home when I take off my prosthesis."

Danny studied accounting and married his girlfriend Ronit. They have two children who were born to the reality of a father in a wheelchair. Although his memories are difficult, he remains the optimist that he always was.

Protecting civilians

Israel is pulling its troops out of south Lebanon. Prime Minister Ehud Barak made withdrawal from Lebanon a main plank of his election platform last year. And he is determined to make good on that promise despite objections from diverse quarters, including, of all people, the presidents of Lebanon and of Syria.

July 7 has been announced as the IDF's withdrawal date. According to media reports last weekend, it may happen even sooner. The dismantling of military infrastructure and the removal of heavy equipment have already begun. There can be no doubt now that Israeli forces will be out of Lebanese territory within weeks.

It is the certainty of Israel's imminent departure that shines a high beam, bright light on the true intentions of Hezbollah in firing the barrage of Katyusha rockets that fell on Kiryat Shmonah last Thursday and Friday in which one IDF soldier was killed and a number of people were injured.

It was the first time Hezbollah shelled Kiryat Shmonah since their Katyusha attack in June 1999 that killed two Israelis. They were not retaliating for the accidental dropping of a bomb last Wednesday by an IAF pilot on the south Lebanese village of Habush that wounded six civilians. Israel made clear the accidental nature of the incident. Nor was Hezbollah retaliating for the deaths of two women caused by shelling from the South Lebanese Army (SLA). Retaliation for the sad deaths of the two women would have been directed precisely and expressly at the SLA. Rather, the eruption of violence was a joint "statement" sent to Israel by the Syrians and Hezbollah that while an IDF withdrawal may remove Israeli soldiers from immediate harm's way, it will not achieve the same result for Israeli civilians living in the north.

The Israeli government responded to the Hezbollah attacks in the same manner it did in June 1999, by sending warplanes to bomb economic infrastructure facilities, and assiduously avoiding bombing near civilian centres.

Israel had to demonstrate to Hezbollah, Syria and the government of Lebanon that the Jewish state will not equivocate in the measures it will take in protecting its own citizens. "The moment there is an attack and danger to the lives of civilians in Israel, including Kiryat Shmonah and the northen border," said Chief of Staff Shaul Mofaz, "we will choose the way to act with full force against targets in Lebanon. I regard the Lebanese government and its army responsible for what happens in its sovereign territory."

In a matter of days there will no longer be an IDF presence on Lebanese soil. The rhetoric and bombings directed at Israel by Hezbollah are not, therefore, aimed at expelling the IDF from "Lebanese soil."

The volley of rockets launched in broad daylight, when most people were simply going about their business on the streets and in the marketplaces, was aimed at killing and injuring as many Jews as possible.

Israel cannot allow these murderous acts to go unpunished.

What Levant does not understand

Ezra Levant's response to Ron Csillag (Letters to the Editor, CJN April 28) is troubling in that it displays a fundamental lack of understanding of both the teachings of Judaism and the mission of the Canadian Jewish Congress.

• CJC does not oppose prayer in the legislature. We oppose the exclusive use of Christian prayer in a public place. Indeed, we support the idea of using the prayers of many faiths, as well as the practice adopted by the House of Commons, which employs a non-denominational prayer and a moment of silence to open its sessions. The Ontario Court of Appeal, in its recent decision, has found the exclusive use of the Lord's Prayer in opening a municipal session to contravene the charter.

• CJC's position with regard to the removal of prayer from public schools is hardly anti-Christian. We believe that public schools are not the proper place for school-initiated prayers of any faith.

• CJC is hardly "endangering the Jewish interest." Rather, we are properly engaged in efforts to ensure that the religious diversity of Ontario/Canada be respected in all of its public institutions.

In reference to Levant's statement that "the words 'human rights' and 'minorities' don't even appear" in the CJC charter, allow me to point out that the second fundamental principle of the Congress agenda adopted at its first plenary in 1919 was "the demand for Jewish national rights for all Jews…and also to demand for the Jews equal rights with the minorities in this country."

This principal now finds its expression in our 1992 Aims and Objectives, which state, in part, that CJC's role is to "investigate anti-Semitism and to devise means of overcoming its influence universally and in Canada in particular; and to promote the growth of a spirit of toleration, understanding and goodwill between all segments of society within a multicultural Canada."

The goal of overcoming anti-Semitism is expressed in tandem with the promotion of tolerance, understanding, goodwill and multiculturalism. The goals of Congress remain unchanged and strong after more than 80 years. As for the "J" in CJC, it is as relevant, vibrant and meaningful as ever with the "J" having pride of place in CJC.

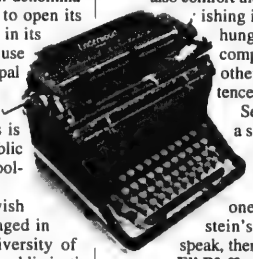
Solace or silence?

Re: "God and Suffering" (CJN April 28). In an attempt to explain God's absence during the Shoah, God-fearing people and theologians offer a variety of reasons for the "manquake," ranging from "because of our sins" to Hester Panim (God's hidden face). Apparently, Elliot Malamet, not a theologian, leans towards the solace seekers who find relief in God's tears mingling with those of the sufferers.

I doubt whether Malamet's recent discovery would also comfort those who stood in the roll call, perishing in the cold, parching in the sun, hunger gnawing at their guts. God's compassion, yes. But what about His other attributes: ubiquity, omnipotence?



Seeking solace in the Holocaust is a sign of an intellectual fallacy best left hidden behind God's hiding face and tears.

When writing on this subject, one should heed Ludwig Wittgenstein's advice: "Whereof one cannot speak, thereof one must be silent."

Appreciative of 'Holland' article

I wish to express my thanks to The CJN for publishing the article by Manfred Gerstenfeld titled "Re-examining Holland's wartime record" (April 28). I have tried many times to explain this issue to my friends here in Canada, but they do not seem to understand; the Netherlands did a great PR con job, even until this day.

My father is a Holocaust survivor and has many horrible stories to tell, apart from the camps, about the way he was treated upon his return to the Netherlands. The way the Dutch behaved after the war is a tragedy on its own. Having worked for the Jewish social services in Amsterdam I got a good education regarding issues that surfaced in a horrible manner after the war.

I am very grateful to live in Canada. I moved here with my husband and two sons four years ago. The possibilities are plentiful and I am actively involved in the Jewish community. It is like being in a warm bath.

The next conflict

As I write this, at the end of March, the American government has been rebuffed by the Syrians, and the attempt to establish a meaningful relationship between Israel and Syria seems to have run aground. Perhaps, by the time you read this, things will have changed, but beyond this problem lie others that will not be resolved in the near future.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

One of these is the pervasive rejection of Israel's existence which has once again become a major theme in Arab propaganda. It has taken a new tack and concentrates on depicting not only the Jewish state but also Jews in general as a sore on the body politic of humanity, and especially in the Middle East.

It is no exaggeration to say that Arab anti-Semitism is far more widespread than Hitler's version ever was. Many millions of homes and thousands of schools teach that there is a Jewish conspiracy abroad and that The Protocols of the Learned Elders of Zion is not fiction but reality.

Once again there is talk of another possible Israeli-Arab war - not immediately, but sometime in the future. The pundits who foresee it believe it is inevitable, given the ever-growing fundamental enmity of the Arab world. There are, to be sure, notable exceptions, but they are just that.

Though I hope the prophets of doom are wrong, I will issue my own warning. It does not deal with the conflict of different peoples and their competition for a piece of land that each party believes it can call its own; rather, it has to do with ideology.

The conflicting parties I have in mind are both Jewish: those who call themselves religious and those who consider themselves to be secular. I foresee persistent serious and worrisome tensions that could develop into a form of civil war, and some analysts believe that it could even lead to bloodshed.

For a long time, the two sides lived peacefully together; today I see the contesting positions hardening – and not only in Israel, but here at home as well.

When I first arrived in Canada, we were still one community, but no longer. We must find a way of sitting down together to join in the solution of common problems. If we were to begin this reconciliation, we might make a beginning, not only for ourselves, but also set an example for our Israeli brothers and sisters.

Regardless of whether or not they would listen to us, we must try and do our bit in this confrontation. It is sure to come unless we Jews will see ourselves again as parts of one family and stop demonizing one another.

I dropped my camera, never being a proficient shutterbug, and somehow one exposure of the Western Wall superimposed onto another. In my picture, there are faint images of people standing and praying at the holiest Jewish site in the world. They look like ghosts.

Jennifer Fox on campus in Halifax

When I stood at the Kotel, I felt the hot wind hit my legs and skirt and I knew I would cry. And I did. I was not the only one. Though the Wall was smaller in proportion than I imagined, it still packed an emotional punch.

Today, three years after my trip, I think about why I had to brush tears off my face and the ghosts in my warped picture. The Kotel is IT. It represents Jewish determination. Sure it was destroyed – twice. We were exiled for a long time but now we're here and it's ours.

When I clenched my hands while listening to discussions about Israel in my Middle East history class, it was because of the Wall and those ghosts. I wanted to defend its honour.

Two months ago, I wrote in this column that I want Israel to be the good guys. Israel turns 52 years old this week. It's no longer a baby, which means I shouldn't treat it as such.

Israel is old enough to own up to her mistakes and accept the bad decisions made by her leaders. The difference between an adult and a child is that an adult takes responsibility for their misdeeds and a child promises to do better next time.

They are not the same and if I want to have adult discussions about my other homeland then I have to be able to say when it is wrong – not they'll do better next time.

All this maturity sort of sneaked up on me. Maybe when I was studying for the Middle East history exam, when I was reading about the instances of strife between Israel and its neighbours, its allies and even within its own borders. I knew I couldn't just excuse everything.

I had the same kind of feeling about Canada in elementary school.

Israel is a subject that gets a gut reaction out of people. This passion just takes over, making itself the focus of attention, which makes it easy to get caught up in defence rather than discussion.

A non-Jewish friend asked me what Jews thought about Israel. I'm assuming he meant us in North America. This unfortunately was during a long distance call so I laughed and told him I couldn't afford to begin to explain it right now.

What will I tell him when we eventually have this conversation? Some Jews support Israel and some don't. Some think it should be a Jewish homeland with Jewish laws.

Others think it's a secular country that's home to Jews. I'll tell him, like most of my other attempts to explain Judaism – no clear-cut decision has been reached.

I might show him my picture of ghosts at the Kotel. As I explain its importance, I'll tell him of a person on my trip that stared at the Wall and said, "It's just a wall," which is true. It's just a wall. It's just a country. But it's mine.

So I raise a glass to Israel and wish her happy 52nd. L'chaim. You're all grown up now.

Let's root for the Expos!

Do you own a Pokemon battling coin game? A calendar that starts in April? Four or five copies of that calendar? I can answer affirmatively to all three questions.

I acquired each of these items upon entering the tallest leaning structure in the world shaped like a toilet bowl which, on an average home game night, hosts about 9,000 lunatic fans trying to hide the 30,000+ empty seats.

Erica Horn on campus in Montreal

If you haven't figured it out, I am referring to the Olympic Stadium.

For those of you residing in Montreal, shame on you for not coming out to cheer on your Expos, who are having a smashing season and who continuously bewilder the fans who do come out.

I have been to five games this season (mainly because my boyfriend is one of those lunatic fans who wears his red Expos cap to every game – the rim is signed by most of the players).

I'll admit that entering such a structure is not done mindlessly. Before leaving the house I wonder whether I should grab a hard hat in case the building should cave in or whether I should simply say my last goodbyes.

In truth, the only "excitement" at the Big O these days is that the Expos are playing phenomenally, and that we are able to afford having the best player in the league on our team – Vladimir Guerrero.

Hopes of constructing a more centrally located downtown stadium to attract more fans have led many Montrealers to start thinking of creative ways to finance such a project.

My friends and I have thought of charging people to take a few swings at the Olympic Stadium with a sledgehammer. Or, asking for donations of dynamite and then using the existing stone to build the new park.

Instead of selling the seats as they did at the Forum before the move to the Molson Centre, simply ask for donations for a moving van and transfer them to the new site.

Montreal is a fair-weather city. We like winning teams and the Expos are exactly that.

It is unfortunate that those who do not trek out to the east end to see the game live aren't blessed with television and radio coverage and thus have missed witnessing any of our 10 home wins and I really can't understand why.

Pay $8 for a general admission ticket and you can literally sit wherever you want (just not in the VIP section). We always sit in section 123 along the first base line because it is most convenient to get autographs after the game, to spy on the Expos bullpen and it is usually vacant.

So, this is essentially an open-ended invitation to join my friends and me at an Expos game (although I'm not offering to pay for your tickets!!).

The Expos put on a good show, above and beyond their ability to play. Management has hired a teenaged boy to dress up as an elderly woman (much like the wolf dressed up like an old lady in Little Red Riding Hood).

He asks whether or not we have seen her son Albert, Martin or whomever it is on a given night and then tells you that if you see him to send him to Expofest (an arcade in the Big O) and then he hands you a coupon for Expofest.

Also, after every Expo home run there are fireworks and as each of our players steps up to bat, a different song is played.

Youppi gallivants around, and if you're lucky he'll hug you or hold you in a headlock. So, if you don't like baseball that is no excuse not to come out and cheer on your team.

How does this relate to Jewish student life on campus? It doesn't, not specifically.

I have noticed many students at the games, many of whom have painted the words Vladi or Expo on their stomachs or have brought their horns and shofars to the games and heckle the ushers.

Moreover, I know that there was a stampede to the home game the night before the first seder and that during Passover many of my friends went and packed knapsacks full of kosher-for-Passover snacks to ensure that they wouldn't go hungry during the 3½-hour showdown.

It is a relatively inexpensive form of recreation (cheaper than a movie) and easily accessible via metro.

Students are known for their idealism and passion. The Expos need us to believe in them – so students, now that school is out, come on out to "root root root for the home team, for if they don't win it's a shame."

The Kirshner File

Ambiguity defines Israel's nuclear policy

Ambiguity is the essence of Israel's nuclear policy. Israel has a nuclear arsenal, but its leaders rarely acknowledge it, even in the face of incontrovertible evidence to the contrary.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

In 1987, when an Israeli citizen named Mordechai Vanunu was sentenced to 18 years in prison for disclosing secrets about Israel's nuclear reactor in Dimona, the Israeli government maintained a studious silence. When pressed, Israeli spokespersons fell back on a familiar rhetorical device: Israel would not be the first country to use nuclear weapons in the Middle East. This policy remains in effect. Two weeks ago, in response to Arab demands calling on Israel to open its nuclear facilities to international inspection, Ephraim Sneh, Israel's deputy defence minister, said: "We are not saying what we have or don't have..."

In point of fact, Israel has had an operational nuclear capability since 1967, if you believe Avner Cohen, an Israeli scholar living in the United States. Cohen, in Israel and the Bomb (Columbia University Press), a sober study on the subject, proves beyond a reasonable doubt that Israel is indeed an atomic power. He draws on Israeli and American government documents, most of them recently declassified and never used before, and interviews with key players to tell his story. The book, he acknowledges, is incomplete, since many documents still remain classified. But for now, Israel and the Bomb should be regarded as the standard work in the field.

Three men set Israel's nuclear project into motion: David Ben-Gurion, the first prime minister; Ernst David Bergmann, an organic chemist and Ben-Gurion's scientific adviser; and Shimon Peres, the director-general of the Ministry of Defence who turned a vision into a reality. Imbued with the lessons of the Holocaust, the most important of which was that Jews in Israel should control their own fate, Ben-Gurion viewed Arab hostility toward the Jewish state as deep and long-lasting. In his opinion, Israel had to base its security on science and technology, the only areas where it could have a significant advantage over its Arab enemies.

Nuclear weapons might also persuade Arab states to accept Israel's existence, leading to peace in the region. As a theory, it was remarkably prescient. Recently, Peres told Israel Radio, "Israel entered the nuclear age not to get to Hiroshima but to arrive at Oslo."

Bergmann, a refugee from Nazi Germany, persuaded Ben-Gurion that a nuclear deterrent might be the key to Israel's survival and prosperity. Nuclear technology, he argued, would open options for civilian and military applications. Not surprisingly, Bergmann was the first chair of the Israel Atomic Energy Commission.

Peres' contributions were twofold: he was the architect of Israel's alliance with France, an entente which made the Dimona reactor possible, and he was instrumental in choosing the project's scientists and managers. It was a monumental task, as Israel did not have a single nuclear physicist in 1948, the year the state was created. Although self-reliance was at the heart of its quest to go nuclear, Israel at first needed outside assistance. In 1953, the first Israeli physicists were sent to France to study reactor physics. Two years later, Israel and the United States signed an agreement for peaceful nuclear co-operation which included the sale of a small research reactor. That was followed by an accord to buy heavy water from Norway for the peaceful use of atomic energy.

Despite these developments, there was no clear consensus in Israel's scientific community as to a policy concerning nuclear energy. While Bergmann called for a dual-purpose program, Amos De Shalit, one of Israel's most prominent scientists, disagreed, arguing that major decisions on military applications should be postponed.

Siding with Bergmann, Ben-Gurion adopted his scheme of pursuing two nuclear paths simultaneously, one public, the other secret. In line with this philosophy, Israel signed a contract with the United States to build a modest reactor in Nachal Sorek as part of the Atoms for Peace program, while secretly continuing to press France for a reactor with military applications. According to Cohen, Ben-Gurion kept most of his cabinet colleagues in the dark about his intention to build a military reactor in Dimona. Nor did he allow the issue to be debated by the armed forces. To maintain secrecy and minimize the risk of opposition, Ben-Gurion and Peres ran the project underground, outside the normal state budget.

In 1960, France, currying favour with the Arab world, decided to sever nuclear ties with Israel. In desperation, Ben-Gurion promised Charles de Gaulle, the French president, not to build a nuclear weapon. A compromise was struck whereby French companies with existing contracts would be allowed to finish work on the Dimona reactor.

David Ben-Gurion

By then, two schools of thought had emerged in Israel about its military doctrine. The backers of a nuclear approach held that only non-conventional weapons could provide Israel with a stable deterrence without being caught up in a conventional arms race. Opponents countered that a military force built on mobile armour and a strong tactical air force would ensure Israel's security.

In a work rife with numerous disclosures, two of the most intriguing aspects of Israel and the Bomb turn on the manner in which the United States and the Arabs, primarily Egypt, responded to Israel's nuclear ambitions. Early in 1958, U-2 reconnaissance flights produced aerial photographs of the construction of the Dimona reactor. It took more than two years for intelligence agencies to identify Dimona as a reactor site. Even then, Israel alternately described Dimona as a textile plant and a metallurgical research installation.

In a meeting with President John F. Kennedy, Ben-Gurion emphasized Israel's interest in the civilian use of nuclear energy. American inspectors visited Dimona, but found no evidence of weapon-related activity. Cohen claims that Kennedy's successor, Lyndon Baines Johnson, did not press Israel to the wall on the nuclear issue, notwithstanding Israel's refusal to sign the 1968 Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty. But according to files released by the U.S. State Department in April, Johnson did in fact exert considerable pressure on Israel. Worried about the threat of nuclear proliferation in the Middle East, he asked Israel for a promise not to develop nuclear weapons. Israel was told in no uncertain terms that it would not be granted permission to buy U.S. arms unless it abided by that pledge. Israel refused, citing reasons of national security.

President Richard Nixon reached a tacit understanding with Israel which holds to this day. If Israel was discreet, the United States would not question its nuclear capability. The Arab world hewed to an identical policy, but on the eve of the Six Day War, Gamal Abdel Nasser, Egypt's president, warned Israel that the acquisition of nuclear weapons would be a cause for war. Cohen claims that Egyptian aircraft made at least two reconnaissance flights over Dimona in May 1967, and that the nuclear issue exacerbated the crisis which culminated with the Six Day War.

Cohen ends Israel and the Bomb on an optimistic note. Israel's nuclear project, he notes, has greatly contributed to the rapid development of Israeli science and technology and solidified its image and status as the strongest nation in the Middle East. But to the Arabs, as Cohen would doubtless agree, Israel's nuclear stockpile is a threat to the security of the entire region.

Questions and answers

By ZE'EV GLICENSTEIN

Your genealogical detective has been busy lately, responding to numerous mail and e-mail inquiries. Readers may find some of them illuminating:

Q: I'm interested in anything you can tell me about about Graeding, a town in Ukraine. I am not sure whether it still exists today. I am especially interested in finding a map of the town. –Yigal Walt, Toronto

A: One of the first and most important things to do when researching an unknown shtetl is to consult Where Once We Walked (WOWW), by Gary Mokotoff and Sallyann Sack. The book's numerical system of phonetics identifies Graeding as Gorodok, a town that had 2,545 Jews in 1939 and is located 26 kilometres west-southwest of Lviv (Lvov). Graeding or Grayding is how the town was pronounced and spelled by its Yiddish-speaking residents.

WOWW also lists numerous other sources, including the Encyclopedia Judaica, the Hebrew-language encyclopedia Pinkas Hakehillot, and the Central Archives for the History of the Jewish People in Jerusalem.

Sefer Grayding, a 120-page yizkor or memorial book, was published in Tel Aviv in 1981. Like most yizkor books, its text is mostly in Hebrew and Yiddish. It is probably available at a local university library or via inter-library loan.

Another valuable source is Jewish Roots in Ukraine and Moldova: Pages From the Past and Archival Inventories, by Miriam Weiner, which gives the archival locations of many 18th- and 19th-century Jewish records from Gorodok. See also Suzan F. Wynne's Finding Your Jewish Roots in Galicia: A Resource Guide.

As a general rule, all researchers should consult the amazing array of resources available through the Internet Web site www.jewishgen.org. One of its databases, the Jewish Genealogical Family Finder (JGFF) provides a listing of more than 50 researchers with ancestral links to Gorodok.

As for maps, the University of Toronto's Robarts Library has a good map library. Your best bet for a detailed map of the shtetl, however, is the yizkor book.

Q: I'm researching the Ansell family tree, which has branches in Britain, Canada, the United States and elsewhere. It's a great tree to work on because a lot of it, such as Isaac Davis' family of Toronto, is documented. Any suggestions? –Judy Wolkovitch, Los Angeles

A: Lawrence Tapper's Biographical Dictionary of Canadian Jewry, 1909-1914, offers a lengthy entry on Isaac Davis, telling us he was born in Moscow in 1806, became a successful merchant in Montreal after 1834, married in England in 1847, and brought his family to Toronto in 1854.

The first naturalized Jew in Toronto, Davis ran a dry goods business on Yonge Street and was gabbai in Toronto's first synagogue on Richmond Street. He died in 1888, survived by his wife and three children – "Henry Davis, manager of the Crochet and Knitting Specialty; David Davis; and Mrs. Miller. Lionel Davis, of the law firm Davis & Mehr, is a grandson." Another entry relates that a Montreal cousin, David Ansell, was the Mexican consul general for Canada.

The Jewish Victorian: Genealogical Information from the Jewish Newspapers, 1871-1880, edited by Doreen Berger (UK, 1999) offers entries on members of the family in England, including the patriarch, Rabbi Zalmon or Salomon, a former chief of the Beth Din in London, and his son Moss Ansell, former president of London's celebrated Soup Kitchen for the Jewish Poor.

The 1934 publication Canadian Jewry: Prominent Jews of Canada (edited by Dr. Zvi Cohen) lists several Davises that may be related. See also The Jew in Canada, an unsurpassed historical tome by Arthur Daniel Hart, published in 1926, and more recent histories by Abella, Speisman and Tulchinsky. Newspaper obituaries are also recommended.

Decades of memories

By MARLENE WALKER

I was born immersed in layers of generations, including three grandparents and three great-grandparents. So, yes, I was blessed and I've never taken it for granted.

Guest Voice

But now, as I approach 50-ish, the threads of my early years and my history are gushing forward to meet the present. I dig up family trees, engage in inquisitive conversations with aging relatives, bury myself in old photographs and enter the world of my paternal grandmother through her journal entries.

I also rummage through drawers, uncovering memories of my youth, and those of my children: a tiny hand moulded from clay, drawings, cards, handwritten apologies for naughty behaviour, awards, first words, funny comments, insightful comments, pictures… The list goes on and on, with every drawer another treasure house of memories.

One day I was talking to my mother about my preoccupation. She understood exactly where I was coming from and commented that "You have to reach a certain age before you can reminisce."

What that age is, is not predetermined but it may reflect a stage in your life, or your children's lives, perhaps an event or maybe serendipity.

Just recently memories have begun to flood my mind; some are trivial events that have arisen from the deep recesses of my being, while others are weaving themselves together into the fabric of my life. The more I remember, the more memories pour in. Sometimes they rush at me, taking me back to my childhood. As I remember, I ask more and more questions about my ancestors.

I seem to need to find out everything I can, before those who know will not be able to tell me. I am curious, intrigued and charmed by these visions, these feelings and by the connectivity of life.

As I delve into this rich personal history, I remember the outline of a funny vignette told to me by a distant relative, who remembered my great-grandfather. I knew that the "punchline" was brilliant Jewish wit, not easily translated into English.

My mother's paternal grandfather, my great-grandfather was a house painter and wallpaper hanger, a simple man in many ways but with great wisdom. One job involved hanging wallpaper that contained a motif of little men. When the owners of the house came home, they inspected my great-grandfather's job, and perplexed, they asked him "What did you do? You put the wallpaper on upside-down." And sure enough two panels had little men standing on their heads. My great-grandfather didn't miss a beat; responding in Yiddish: "Dis is de veldt mir voint in – Menchele aroif und menchele arup." (This is the world we live in, some people are up and some people are down.)

I have my own memories of Grandpa Phyvel as a very old man, a patriarch with a long grey beard down to his waist. I was three years old, and remember a "going-away" family gathering because, in my mind, he was going to Israel to die. But he flourished in Israel for four years before he died at the age of 89. He had his wish and was buried in the Holy Land at the Bnei Brak Cemetery.

Recently, my maternal grandmother, who is almost 91 years old, gave me a picture of the family gathering, which took place in June 1955. I was wearing a frilly sundress with barrettes in my long brown hair, wrapped in the arms of my father, who stood beside my maternal grandfather and my mother, who sat on a chair dressed in maternity clothes.

What happens to events over the years? Whatever they are, memories are our own, on shelves in our minds, layered with the perceptions or misperceptions of time, but nevertheless are special.

Pictures document the reality, but even though I see the picture, the visualization in my mind remains the one of a three-year-old saying good-bye to the old patriarch with the waist-length beard.

Jewish Life

Jewish sites for teens

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

It's one of the largest Jewish youth movements in the world – and it's as close as your keyboard. There's a wealth of information, camaraderie and fun for young people on the Web. Today, I am going to look at some great sites that are geared at Jewish teenagers. (Next time, Jewish sites for younger kids.)

A good place to start is JVibe [http://www.jvibe.com]. You will find a wide range of topics such as: an interview with Jerusalem-born, Long Island-raised actress Natalie Portman on playing roles ranging from Anne Frank to Star Wars' Queen Amidala; poetry about Yom Hashoah titled Death of the Innocent; an advice columnist named – Tell Aviv.

There is also a Jewish sports IQ quiz. Sample question: Which Jewish basketball player appeared in the first 12 NBA all-star games, and was recently chosen by the NBA as one of the 50 greatest players of all time? (Dolph Schayes)

Two other on-line magazines are Virtual Jerusalem's Teens [http://www.virtualjerusalem.com/VJTeens/index.htm] which has an article on interdating and intermarriage, along with its own advice column and a brain teasers section. The best articles in Teen-to-Teen are by young people telling the stories of their lives [http://www.ttt.org.il/index.shtml].

There's Yehuda who is finishing his combat engineering course in the Israel Defence Force, Mike who writes about living on a West Bank settlement and Chava who explains what it's like to live a Jewish life in northern Montana where the nearest Jewish community is 300 miles away. There's also a photo studio section, tips on creative writing and a joke page. For example, What do you call an 18-storey condo in Tel Aviv? (A chai-rise.)

If you are a teen or in your 20s and are considering spending some time in Israel, then you should definitely check out the Birthright Israel Web site [http://www.israelexperience.org/]. This is a clearing-house for information about hundreds of Israeli programs geared toward young people. Search for the perfect program by using the site's database and compare notes with other travellers who have been there, done that. There is also information about the subsidies available to participants in these programs.

Although JewishYouth.com isn't strictly a site just for teenagers, it will be handy for anyone, from teens to adults, who creates programming for Jewish kids [http://www.jewishyouth.com]. This site is a great resource centre for anyone who works with Jewish youth, such as camp staff, teachers or for those who work at Jewish youth organizations. There are tips for organizing programs, sparking discussions about ethical issues and ideas for holiday-related activities. There's even a link to a job-board for people working with Jewish youth.

If you are still looking for more Jewish youth sites, take a look at Mishmash's Jewish Youth Directory [http://mishmash.virtualave.net/kids.html]. You'll find links to dozens of Jewish summer camps, university campus organizations and billboard areas for alumni of Jewish youth organizations.

I want to conclude by returning to JVibe.com and what I found to be a witty way to introduce a Jewish tradition to young people by using an icon of popular culture: The Homer Calendar [http://www.jvibe.com/homer/].

We are currently in the period of Sefirat Ha'Omer when we count the 49 days between Passover and Shavuot. Keeping track of the daily count can be confusing, but if H'Omer Simpson can do it, so can you. There are articles about the reasons for counting the Omer, appropriate charts and illustrations of Homer next to the blessing and that day's recitation – all halachically correct.

Where else could you find a cartoon of Bart Simpson writing lines on the chalkboard – I will remember to count the Omer.

Diaries recount life in Germany

I Will Bear Witness, A Diary of the Nazi Years 1942-1945 By Victor Klemperer (Random House)

Books
Bernard Baskin

Those who read the initial portion of Klemperer's astonishing account of his day-by-day experiences in Nazi Germany during the years 1933 to 1941, will welcome this final instalment that covers the years 1942 to 1945.

This massive diary is a major source for the study of the Holocaust and the lives of ordinary Germans during the 12 years of Nazi power. The author, the son of a liberal Berlin rabbi, and a decorated veteran of World War I, married a Protestant woman and converted to Christianity. He was a professor of Romance languages at the Dresden Technical Institute and an acknowledged scholar and admired writer.

The fact that his wife was a gentile, undoubtedly saved him from quick deportation to a death camp. But, the couple were forced to leave their home and move into a "Jews' House" in Dresden. They had to give up their telephone, radio and typewriter; they could no longer walk in city parks, attend movies or theatres, use streetcars or shop, except at limited times.

Klemperer had to wear a yellow Jewish star and he and Eve were subjected to an ever-increasing escalation of Nazi tyranny.

Even though he grew more pessimistic and desolate, he did not lose his sharp and almost objective power of observation and his precise and meticulous style.

In 1936, in a moment of self recognition, Klemperer removed all masks of self-deception and wrote: "The majority of people…believe that it is inopportune to be outraged at such details as the suppression of civil liberties, the persecution of the Jews…the systematic destruction of all morality.

"And all are afraid for their livelihood, their life, all are such terrible cowards. (Can I reproach them with it?…I swore an oath to Hitler, I have remained in the country – I am no better than my Aryan fellow creatures)."

The present volume describes Klemperer's life in Dresden from 1942 through the end of the fighting with a cool and unsparing eye that uses the very act of writing, of keeping his diary, as a form of subversion directed against the Nazi regime.

Klemperer records his daily experiences in the "Jews' House" with a marvellous facility for capturing all of the ordinary and extraordinary aspects of life. Surviving the devastation of Dresden, the couple, during the chaos and confusion that followed, made their way to Bavaria, where they were eventually liberated by the American army.

The reader of this remarkable book is confronted with a paradox of a German patriot and member of the academic elite. He repeatedly insists on his "Germanness," while at the same time, he is reduced to overwhelming fear about the coming day, when even Jews in mixed marriages may be sent to labour camps, which he knows means certain death.

The author has insightful entries on so-called "good Germans," inbred German anti-Semitism, the reaction of his Jewish neighbours and friends to their unhappy plight, the question of Zionism, the essential differences between eastern and western Jews, and his impressions of victorious American soldiers – naive, arrogant, kind, but culturally backward.

This book, an unforgettable testimony – now translated into 12 languages – is compulsively readable and at the same time, a portentous slice of modern history.

DR. MEL STARR
REGISTERED PSYCHOLOGIST

Dr. Starr is pleased to announce the opening (June 1/00) of a new office closer to the downtown core on Huron Street, just a block north of Bloor Street in the Annex. Dr. Starr is a Registered Psychologist in the Province of Ontario and has been in private practice for close to twenty years. He treats primarily adults in individual psychotherapy as well as in marital and sexual therapy. In his treatment approach he emphasizes understanding and explaining the unique meaning of each person's subjective experience. He focuses on strengthening the person's "self" such that they develop appropriate ambitions guided by reasonable ideals as well as possessing good self-esteem.
He believes that marriages fail when couples cannot adequately manage disagreements, and when they do not place sufficient emphasis on doing what is good for the marriage as opposed to each person's separate needs. In addition, couples must be able to let themselves be influenced by their partners, and they need to become familiar with each other's strengths, vulnerabilities, and needs, to be able to provide the empathic understanding and acceptance for the marriage to grow.

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Ethnic cleansing, though clearly a crime against humanity, cannot be lumped together with genocide, according to an Israeli specialist in international law.

Genocide, as defined by the 1948 United Nations Genocide Convention, refers to the deliberately planned destruction of an ethnic and/or religious group, Tel Aviv University professor Yoram Dinstein said last week.

Under this definition, the Holocaust and the mass murder of the Tutsis in Rwanda qualify as genocide, noted Dinstein, delivering the Stuart and Hadassa Rosenberg Memorial Lecture at Beth Tzedec Congregation.

Yoram Dinstein

Ethnic cleansing, on the other hand, takes place when members of an identifiable minority, like the ethnic Albanians of Kosovo, are driven out of their homes, pointed out Dinstein, currently teaching at the U.S. Naval War College in Newport, Rhode Island.

Genocide, a term coined by Polish Jew Raphael Lemkin in 1944 to describe the systematic murder of Jews by Nazi Germany, ultimately turns on intentions, not results, Dinstein observed.

Without naming them, he charged that some militant Muslim movements advocate genocidal policies.

Arguing that the mass murders in Cambodia's killing fields were motivated by political and ideological reasons rather than by ethnic or religious considerations, Dinstein said that they do not fall under the category of genocide.

By contrast, Rwanda qualifies as the only certifiable case of genocide since the Holocaust, he added.

Calling the Holocaust a unique event, Dinstein, the immediate past president of Tel Aviv University, suggested that it was history's most cold-blooded attempt to annihilate a people.

The Holocaust is also unique due to the top-to-bottom degree of collaboration with the Germans.

Citing a few examples, Dinstein spoke of the anti-Semitic zealousness of the Vichy regime in France and of collaborators in Lithuania and Latvia, the high proportion of Dutch Jews who died during the German occupation, and the Bulgarian government's complicity in the deaths of non-Bulgarian Jews in Thrace and Macedonia.

After two millenniums, anti-Semitism is still going strong, despite the march of human progress, said Dinstein.

Hatred of Jews is inspired by envy of Jewish success and wildly exaggerated fears of Jewish power, as exemplified by The Protocols of the Elders of Zion, which has been exposed as a czarist forgery.

Dinstein blasted Israeli public figures who use the word "Shoah" flippantly to describe what he called minor disasters.

And in a reference to ethnic cleansing in the Balkans, Dinstein said that NATO, including Canada, breached international law by bombing Yugoslavia in 1999.

The 86-day bombing campaign, he warned, has created a deadly precedent.

"What's to prevent the Arab League from intervening in Israel?

"What prevents China from sending troops to the Philippines?

"To start killing people in the name of human rights is wrong."

> 'To start killing people in the name of human rights is wrong'

He criticized European governments for doing little to counter neo-Nazis.

In reply to a question, Dinstein lambasted the new school of Israeli historians who have written that Israel practised ethnic cleansing during the 1948 Arab-Israeli war.

"This is a calumny of incredible chutzpah," said Dinstein, who contemptuously dismissed their books as "nonsensical."

Dinstein claimed that Palestinian Arabs were not forced out of Palestine and that tens of thousands of them were allowed to return through family reunion programs.

He expressed regret that the current Israeli government has remained aloof from and indifferent to the writings produced by this school of historians.

The Year Of A Million Miracles

As Israel celebrated its 52nd anniversary, another miracle came home. The one-millionth immigrant to Israel since 1989 when the current tidal wave of aliyah began.

There is no parallel, since biblical times, to this remarkable miracle of immigration from the former Soviet Union and Ethiopia. And no one could have been freed from warfare, poverty, insecurity and anti-Semitism without the generosity of our Jewish community. Your UJA FEDERATION gift paid for plane tickets, aliyah preparation and absorption. Your commitment created this year's historic one million milestone.

What does it take to make miracles commonplace? It takes an eternal responsibility for Jews everywhere. A deep and devoted partnership. It takes a million Jewish immigrants. One miracle at a time.

Centre must stay strong, says new Rabbinical Assembly president

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The recently named president of the Rabbinical Assembly (RA), the 1,500-member international body of Conservative rabbis, has strong roots in Toronto.

Rabbi Vernon Kurtz, spiritual leader of North Suburban Synagogue Beth El in Highland Park., Ill., was born and raised here, and is an alumnus of Associated Hebrew Day Schools, Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto and York University, where he received his bachelor of arts degree in political science.

He also has a doctor of ministry degree from the Chicago Theological Seminary, a Protestant institution.

Rabbi Kurtz began his two-year term as RA president in March, when he succeeded Rabbi Seymour Essrog at the organization's 100th annual convention, held in Philadelphia.

Among his priorities, he said in a recent phone interview from his Chicago-area synagogue, is recognizing the global nature of the assembly.

The RA is affiliated with a total of five seminaries, located in New York (Rabbi Kurtz' alma mater), Los Angeles, Jerusalem, Budapest and Buenos Aires. For the first time, Rabbi Kurtz noted, the RA's vice-president (Rabbi Reuven Hammer) is from Israel.

"We intend to work with our colleagues there to ensure their rights and support the State of Israel as need be," he said.

Despite concern over issues of religious pluralism in Israel, Rabbi Kurtz, 49, describes himself as more optimistic than he was, because of the Masorti movement's growth in terms of education. To cite two examples,Conservative rabbis are being trained in Israel and there is a Masorti youth group there.

From a political perspective, however, progress is harder to discern, the rabbi said. "It's a long journey we are on, which we believe is for the benefit of Israel and world Jewry."

The RA agenda also includes much in the way of liturgical publications, Rabbi Kurtz indicated. In addition to the new Siddur Sim Shalom published in 1998, a committee is working on a weekday prayer-book, a French-language siddur and a revised machzor and Chumash.

Because the Conservative movement is "in the centre" denominationally, the rabbi feels it's crucial that it stay strong. "We can talk to both sides. We can agree to disagree in some areas and work together in other areas...I believe the centre must hold, lest the extremes pull the Jewish people apart."

Rabbi Vernon Kurtz

Within the Conservative movement, Rabbi Kurtz believes that much more unites members than divides them. In Conservative synagogues, he noted, there may or may not be musical instruments, there may be a different siddur or varying degrees of women's participation, but there is a common philosophy. The movement's committee of Jewish laws and standards also provides commonality, he said.

And while much of the Conservative movement has shifted leftward in recent years – it's only in the last 15 years that women have been ordained as Conservative rabbis, for example – Rabbi Kurtz "definitely" thinks there's a place for traditional congregations within the movement.

Rabbi Kurtz has a fairly traditional background himself, having grown up at Toronto's Shaarei Shomayim Congregation, an Orthodox synagogue where he and his father Bernard used to sing in the choir.

The rabbi met his wife Bryna (née Wise) when both were teens in United Synagogue Youth, the Conservative Youth movement. He later served two Conservative congregations, Beth Am (now part of Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Congregation) as youth adviser and Beth Tikvah Synagogue as youth director.

A LIGHT IN THE DARKNESS
The Amazing Story of Chiune Sugihara (The Japanese Ambassador to Lithuania) who saved the Jews during World War II
Date: Wed. May 17, 2000 at 8:00 p.m.
LECTURER: HIROKI SUGIHARA (HIS SON)

Join us as we honour Hiroki Sugihara, son of Chiune Sugihara, the Japanese Ambassador to Lithuania, who was responsible for saving close to 10,000 Jews during the Holocaust.
Hiroki will deliver a lecture and tell the story of his father's heroism. He will then be presented with an award by a Holocaust survivor who is alive today because of his father's efforts.
Make sure to attend what promises to be a fascinating story of courage and kindness. A glimmer of light in what was otherwise one of the darkest periods of our History.

Shaarei Tzedec gets $5,000 donation from Lions

Dr. Joe honoured by Forest Hill Club

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The Forest Hill Lions Club (FHLC), recently presented a cheque for $5,000 to Toronto's Congregation Shaarei Tzedec.

At a dinner held at Villa Columbo, Dr. Joe Greenberg, who was selected as the club's Man of the Year, was presented with the donation.

Dr. Joe, as he is fondly referred to, has been the custodian and president of the synagogue for 33 years. The shul is located at the corner of Markham and Ulster streets.

"I would like to establish a shul that has no membership fees and where anyone can come," he says. "The money from the Lions Club goes to an endowment fund that will help the shul survive forever.

"There is no mortgage on the building, no taxes to pay, and the staff members are all volunteers," he says. "I hope the establishment of the endowment fund will help perpetuate this landmark."

He notes that "our shul is different than others. Most come with their children, but they are really sitting with parents who are no longer alive. It's like a living museum. And we provide kiddush and a meal for all those who come on Shabbat or yom tov."

Dr. Joe's parents, Aaron and Sima Greenberg were early members of the congregation; his son, Dr. David Greenberg, is the vice-president.

"I believe the dream of perpetuating the synagogue is attainable," he says.

The FHLC, which was formed in 1952, has supported numerous non-sectarian groups and causes.

Moe Emer and Mickey Snow are two founding members who are still actively involved in FHLC. Emer, chair of the club's award committee says "Dr. Joe was selected as honoree for his accomplishments in his 47 years of practice. He is a wonderful doctor and a real mentsch to his patients and friends.

"He believes, above all, very strongly, that his patients are his family and his object in life is to be available when they need his help."

Emer says the FHLC has raised more than $2.5 million – approximately $100,000 a year through fund-raising activities. He notes that FHLC belongs to a network of clubs. The first Lions club was established in 1917 and there are now more than a million and a half members worldwide – the largest service organization in the world.

FHLC's 50 members fill 85 requests for help each year. "We are both a service club and a social club," says Emer. "We come from different backgrounds, but we are united by one common desire – to help those who are in need. We have members from Christian communities, the Asian community but primarily, FHLC has Jewish members."

FHLC supports numerous service projects through funding and volunteers.

"We are trying to encourage our members to introduce their sons and their friends to become part of Lionism," says Emer. "By encouraging younger men to join, we hope to perpetuate what we have achieved and guarantee the survival of our club – and continue to carry on the work that we do."

Sugihara to be honored

TORONTO — Chiune Sugihara, a Japanese diplomat who was personally responsible for saving close to 3,000 Jews during the Holocaust, will be honoured by the Jewish community on May 17.

His son, Hiroki, will be accepting this posthumous honour on his behalf at Chabad Lubavitch of Markham, 83 Green Lane, Thornhill, at 8 p.m.

The award will be presented by Rabbi Moshe Gerlitzky, a Holocaust survivor saved by Sugihara, and grandfather of Rebbetzin Goldie Plotkin of Chabad Lubavitch of Markham. He will personally thank Sugihara, on behalf of all the survivors and their families.

Hiroki Sugihara will speak about his father's life and his self-sacrifice on behalf of the Jews of Eastern Europe.

Just before the Nazis stormed Lithuania and Poland, Sugihara, in his capacity as a Japanese diplomat to Lithuania, issued within a two-week period, thousands of transit visas to Japan. This was against the orders of his government.

After being brought back to Japan in disgrace and dismissed from the Foreign Service, Sugihara spent the rest of his career as a translator and later as a manager of an import company. He never spoke about what he did.

It wasn't until 1969, when one of the Sugihara survivors tracked him down, that his story emerged. Until then, according to his son, Sugihara never knew whether the people he issued visas to had survived.

"He never knew for 28 years what had happened to them. When he found out about the survivors, he told me it was the happiest day of his life," Hiroki Sugihara said.

In 1965, Sugihara was honoured at Israel's Yad Vashem Holocaust memorial. Because Sugihara, then 86, was too old and ill to travel to Israel, he sent his family in his place. The Japanese government honoured him only after he died in 1986.

Hiroki was five when his father was saving lives in Lithuania. He recalls playing with the children of the desperate families who were lined up by the hundreds outside the consulate seeking visas.

"I asked my father what would happen to the children. And he told me that they would die if we didn't help them," he says.

It is estimated that more than 40,000 Jews worldwide owe their lives to this hero. Chabad Lubavitch of Markham has attempted to locate and invite as many of them as possible to this presentation.

Tickets are $10 at the door. For more information, call Rabbi Avraham Plotkin at 905-886-0420.

Dreams are a message from God, says rabbi

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Dreams are the passageway through which God reveals himself to humans, not a conduit of the imagination, says Rabbi Jerry Steinberg, a psychotherapist, practising mystic and author.

"It is because of dreams that Jews are in the world today," he said at a recent adult education program at Temple Sinai.

After Joseph interpreted the pharaoh's dream about seven years of plenty and seven years of famine, said Rabbi Steinberg, Jacob sent his other sons to Egypt because he knew food would be available there. "We owe our existence to the fact that historically, we were saved because of a dream.

"Dreams are a well-established means of getting messages; many passages in the Torah relate to it. In the Talmud it says that a dream that is not interpreted is like a letter that is not opened."

Jacob awoke after dreaming of angels going up and down ladders, and realized that it is through dreams that we have a gateway to God, he said.

Rabbi Steinberg, who is writing a book about dreams, interviewed a 32-year-old woman whose grandfather had died when she was 17. "She had not had time to mourn him, and it bothered her for many years. She had a dream, however, in which he came to her and told her to move forward; he was not longer in pain.

"She was convinced it was really her grandfather because he was speaking in a level of Romanian that she could not have possibly spoken. It could not have been her imagination."

It is obvious through his interviews, said Rabbi Steinberg, that the revelation of God in people's dreams did not end with the Torah. "It is a continuing practice that goes on as we speak.

"I believe that God is operative through our dreams. It just comes from another dimension of reality than what we normally experience."

Dreams can be interpreted in several different levels, he said, including the emotional, spiritual, physical, intellectual, creative or factual. "When people present a dream to me, I do not interpret it for them; I help them do it themselves. I have a deep belief that my clients can interpret their own dreams."

Everyone dreams between two and 2½ hours a night, said Rabbi Steinberg, "and half of [the dreams] are dreamed in the last 1½ hours of sleep.

"If people are motivated, they can train themselves to remember their dreams. I advise them to put a book beside their bed and jot down the date. Even if otherwise, the book remains empty, it is a message to the unconscious to remember dreams.

"If you tell yourself every night that you will remember your dreams, you eventually will remember. Every tiny fragment of a dream written down, is further reinforcement for your unconscious to retain your dreams."

Ont. budget studied for special needs funds

Congress fears the move will exclude children with other special education needs, such as learning disabilities, because those needs are covered by the education ministry, and are not available in private schools.

The promise referred to in the budget is one made by Premier Mike Harris to CJC, when he said all special needs children should be treated equally, whether they attend private or public schools.

Last December, Health Minister Elizabeth Witmer promised Jewish communal leaders that up to $3 million a year would be made available for special support services for children with specific medical needs.

Following Witmer's announcement, a 10-member working group representing private schools was established by the health ministry to advise it on policy and implementation. The Jewish community was represented by Congress and Carol Goldman, principal of Zareinu Educational Centre, the community's only school for "complex needs" children – those who are both physically and developmentally challenged.

However, the government's definition of health care provision in schools was narrowed to five areas, all physical: nursing, physiotherapy, occupational therapy, dietetic services and speech or language pathology. No mention was made of other special needs children, such as the developmentally disabled, slow learners, children with attention problems or children with multiple needs.

Simon Rosenblum, director of public policy for CJC's Ontario region, called the announcement a good start, but added that under the current arrangement, much of the funds will be left unspent because they are intended for a small number of children.

CJC region chair Keith Landy said Congress will lobby to access the funds for all special needs children. He said it is difficult, but not unheard of, for governments to transfer funds from one ministry to another.

"Right now, it's buried beneath layers of bureaucracy. It's difficult to fathom what's being offered," Landy said. But sounding a more optimistic tone, he added: "When the dust settles, certain of our community needs will be met. This is something we've never had before, and it will have a significant impact."

"So far, we don't seem to fit into the picture" because the 65 children at the facility have both development and physical needs."The designation [of the funds] isn't clear."

Goldman also fears that the money, as allocated, might not be tapped to its fullest potential. Similar funding to the education ministry would have helped "the vast majority" of Jewish day school children with special needs, she said.

According to Georgeanne Burke, a leading voice within the Ontario Association of Jewish Schools, "almost no" students in Jewish day schools would qualify for the funds as they have been allocated.

Burke said students who require medical care have traditionally not attended private schools in the first place.

She cited research which supposedly shows that of the 90,000 children in private and independent schools in Ontario, only .2 percent, or 180, have the kind of conditions that would qualify them for this sort of funding.

Burke said developmentally handicapped children in religious-based schools would not qualify.

"The intent is good, but the impact is not what it should be," she said of the budget announcement.

BIALIK REMEMBERS: Bialik Hebrew Day School's recent Yom Hashoah program commemorated the destruction of the Eastern European way of life which had the Yiddish language as its foundation. Students also celebrated 1,000 years of Yiddish and paid tribute to the preservation and culture of the language. The six memorial candles were lit by survivors and their grandchildren. Shown, from left, are Ethel Cooper, a Yiddish teacher at Bialik who arranged and directed the program; student David Levy and his grandmother, Paula Mintz, a Holocaust survivor. Torah and Vocational Institute takes UQAM to court over cancellation

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Next week, the Quebec Superior Court is expected to hear a request for a permanent injunction filed by the Torah and Vocational Institute (TAV) against the Université du Québec à Montréal (UQAM).

TAV, a nonprofit corporation established to provide post-secondary education to the Orthodox Jewish community, is arguing that UQAM broke a contract when it cancelled a degree-granting program it launched jointly with TAV last September.

TAV academic director Eli Meroz said the agreement signed in April, 1999, creating the program, was for three years and either party could cancel only with six months' notice. It is TAV's interpretation that that meant six months before the end of the three years.

Degree-granting program ended

In its motion, TAV claims UQAM terminated the agreement "on the basis of pure discrimination and intolerance, without right and without any default on the part of TAV..."

The TAV-UQAM program, which leads to a bachelor's degree in computer science or a business administration certificate, has about 550 students currently enrolled. Almost 170 of them are Chassidim who attended classes segregated by gender at a second campus in Outremont. Most of the other students are immigrants, Jewish and non-Jewish.

TAV said it projected that 800 new students would have registered for next fall's session. Registration would normally have ended in April.

Last month, the UQAM senate announced it was pulling out of the program after the professors' union complained that too much of the program was taught in English and that the segregation of the sexes was not in keeping with the university's mission.

TAV claims UQAM's cancellation is "a result of discriminatory remarks and pressure from certain of its constituents regarding the use of the English language and respect for cultural traditions in regard to class composition, all of which formed the very basis" of the contract.

UQAM said it would honour its obligations to those students already enrolled until they finish, but no new admissions would be accepted and the segregation of students would cease immediately because that was not part of the contract.

TAV says UQAM was "fully aware of and endorsed the character, purpose, operations, facilities, mode, nature and language of instruction and composition of the student body of TAV..."

In March, UQAM also "without notice...and without TAV's consent" cancelled the program's scheduled summer session, a point also made in TAV's motion to the court.

TAV notes that it invested over $100,000 in upgrading and furnishing its facilities in anticipation of these summer courses and that it lost $72,000 in rental income because it vacated an entire floor that was to be renovated to accommodate the additional students expected to start next fall.

The Superior Court rejected TAV's request for an interim injunction which would have forced UQAM to allow TAV to continue to take registration for next September.

Aunt Pearl and Aunt Edyie

ORLY,

Six years have passed
Since you left us.
Although it feels like yesterday
Since you were here.

Your spirit lives on in those who knew you.
You touched their lives so profoundly that your impact radiates from them to those who never met you.
That is the special person you were.

I will keep your memory alive forever...

I love you my dearest Orly,
You are with me day and night,
Forever my sister,
Forever "my light".

Love Tali

ORLY,

Six years, six months, six minutes, six seconds
Time has no meaning, it is all yesterday.

Yesterday when we spoke;
Yesterday when I hugged you goodnight.
Yesterday when your phone rang till dawn because you "had to" help your friends.

Yesterday when you told a friend
"I'll call you when I get back from the hospital"

Yesterday when I was told you would never come back.

I cherish you today as I did yesterday.
As I have all the yesterdays.

I ache for you today as I have everyday
Since that first day after yesterday.

Forever Your Mom

The year in review at Queen's University

By ROB INY
Special to the CJN

KINGSTON — High school students can look at the Hillel Web site at Queen's as a sign that there really is Jewish life on campus.

Comment

Over the past few years, Hillel at Queen's University (http://www.ams.queensu.ca/hillel) has become an educational and social foundation for Jewish students in Kingston.

This year, Hillel added new events to the traditional mix of activities, allowing it to reach out to a larger and more diverse group of Jewish students.

Our opening barbecue and monthly Shabbat dinners drew on average between 60 and 70 Hillel members.

One of our Shabbat dinners included a lecture given by Gerald Tulchinsky, chair of the department of Jewish studies at Queen's, on the Canadian response to the Holocaust. Adding an educational twist to the dinner was a great hit, bringing out Jews and non-Jews alike to the Hillel House.

One of the executive's most successful initiatives occurred in January when 75 Queen's students travelled to the Holocaust museum in Washington D.C. and toured the city.

The trip was publicized to the whole Queen's community, and not only to Hillel members. Therefore, the museum was a first exposure to Holocaust education for many non-Jewish students.

Queen's Hillel also had a huge representation at the Canada-Israel Committee dinner on March 29. Thirty-six Queen's students jumped at the opportunity to hear Shimon Peres and Jean Chrétien speak, and headed to Ottawa for the committee's parliamentary dinner and policy conference.

Some of the students that went to Ottawa for the conference had just returned from a visit to Israel as part of the Birthright Israel program, an initiative which offers thousands of university-aged students free trips to the Jewish homeland.

Queen's University students came back to Kingston with rave reviews. The general consensus from these students is that they want to return to Israel as soon as possible. Since that option is not immediately possible, many have satisfied their Jewish cravings by becoming more active Hillel members. They shared their experiences with us at our last Shabbat dinner, and came out to socialize with us at our Purim wine and cheese party.

This party was another first for Hillel this year, and it was a huge success. About a hundred students showed up on a Thursday night, and had a great time playing pool and socializing at the Hillel house.

It is important for high school students across the country to recognize that Queen's Hillel, as well as the Kingston Jewish community, are extremely active in supporting Jewish life on campus.

The Hillel executive managed to accomplish more this year thanks to the help of Rosanne Brown, who is our liaison to Canadian Jewish Congress.

With the school year ending, Queen's Hillel is already preparing to welcome new students next fall. The opening barbecue on September 10 will be testament to Queen's growing Jewish student involvement.

If you have any questions about Queen's Hillel, please contact our new president for the 2000-2001 school year, Rob Richler, at 8rjr@qlink.queensu.ca.

Talks on refugees postponed

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Mideast peace talks scheduled to take place in Ottawa next week have been postponed.

Now is "not the right time" for the talks, Valerie Noftle, a spokesperson for the Foreign Affairs Canada, told The CJN last week.

Noftle said she could not elaborate.

The Refugee Working Group (RWG), which Canada has chaired since 1992, was slated to meet in the nation's capital May 16 to 18 to continue trying to resolve the fate of Palestinian refugees – those who were evicted or fled following Israel's independence in 1948 and after the 1967 Six Day War.

Noftle said the talks were put off, but not because members of the working group refused to participate.

She also refused to link the postponement to lack of progress in talks between Israel and Syria.

A possible related development was last week's announcement that Israel and the Palestinians would not meet a May 31 deadline to hammer a framework for a permanent peace treaty.

Reports from Israel indicate that despite a push from U.S. envoy Dennis Ross, the framework for a treaty is behind in four areas: borders, the status of Jerusalem, the future of Jewish settlements in the West Bank and Gaza Strip, and the fate of Palestinian refugees.

An outline for a treaty was due Feb. 13, but was pushed back to the end of May. The full treaty is due Sept. 13.

Noftle said the Ottawa negotiations will likely not take place for at least two months.

The RWG is one of five rounds of talks within the multilateral framework of Mideast negotiations. The last time the group met in Ottawa was 1992, but there have been several rounds of talks in other world capitals since. Canada is referred to as the group's gavel holder.

Mideast experts agree that the issue of Palestinian refugees is among the most contentious of the outstanding matters facing Israel.

Over the decades, there has been wide disagreement on the number of Palestinian refugees. The UN puts the figure at 3.5 million; Israel estimates the total is around two million, while Palestinians have said the number is more than five million.

Following the 1948 War of Independence, 726,000 Palestinians became refugees. Only 156,000 remained in Israel proper.

Israel has always categorically ruled out the right of Palestinians to return to their pre-1948 or pre-1967 homes because the resultant influx of millions of Arabs would threaten the Jewish majority – and thus spell the end of the Zionist dream.

But since bilateral and multilateral peace talks began in 1991, Israel has become more receptive to financially compensating Palestinians who lay claim to pre-state property or who have suffered as a result of being uprooted.

Israel's embassy in Ottawa had no comment on the postponement of the talks on refugees.

Reveal fate of MiAs, vigil told

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Unless Syria reveals what happened to four Israeli soldiers missing in action since the 1980s, peace talks between Israel and Syria should be put on hold, speakers said at a Passover prayer vigil.

Three of the soldiers – Zachary Baumel, Yehuda Katz, and Zvi Feldman – were captured on June 11, 1982. The fourth, Ron Arad, has been missing since October, 1987.

"Every conversation between Israel and Syria has to begin with a demand for full accounting," Rabbi Reuben Poupko told a group of 50 people gathered on St. Urbain Street in front of the building housing the offices of the honorary Syrian Consul-General.

"It's not a precondition. It is a litmus test. Don't talk to Syria unless we know what happened."

The vigil, comprised mostly of students from Bnei Akiva, was held during Passover to underscore that the "Festival of Freedom" is a time when the liberation of Jews should be occupying the hearts and minds of the Jewish community.

B'nai Brith Quebec director Robert Libman told The CJN that with peace talks between Israel and Syria at an important juncture, "the time is ripe to put pressure" on Syria.

As students lit four memorial candles, and held up photographs of the MiAs and make-shift placards reading, "Free Our Soldiers" and "Let Our People Go," Rabbi Gelman spoke of the continuing agony of the MiAs' families, who have been kept in the dark about their sons.

"Imagine waking up without knowing whether your child is alive or dead," he said. "Enough is enough."

Rabbi Gelman, however, held out a glimmer of hope about the MiAs' status.

Quebec MNAs stand in silence with community

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

QUEBEC CITY — The national assembly commemorated the first Yom Hashoah on the government calendar May 2 with dignified silence and expressions of sympathy for the six million Jews murdered during the Holocaust.

Yom Hashoah

Premier Lucien Bouchard, Liberal leader Jean Charest and Action Démocratique du Québec leader Mario Dumont spoke about the significance of the occasion. All the MNAs then stood silently for one minute, along with the 55 members of the Jewish community in the parliamentary gallery who were invited to the provincial capital for the historic day by Speaker Jean-Pierre Charbonneau.

"I would like to add my voice... knowing, however, how words are incapable of describing our feelings, faced with what happened in connection with the events of the Holocaust," Bouchard told the assembly during question period.

"I believe what we can do... is to have a duty to remember, to remind ourselves what happened, and [take the] responsibility to make sure that such a thing will never happen again."

Charest said the legislation is a way to express "to our brothers and sisters in the Jewish community of Quebec that the emotion they feel today is shared by each of us."

Also adding their voices were André Boulerice, MNA for Sainte-Marie-Saint-Jacques, and D'Arcy McGee MNA Lawrence Bergman, who were responsible for tabling the Yom Hashoah legislation passed unanimously by the assembly last December.

Four other provinces have thus far adopted similar legislation. Bergman, who presented a motion reaffirming the day, said the legislation – Bill 198 – constitutes a "moving expression of solidarity" towards Quebec's Jewish community, which includes Holocaust survivors, their children, and grandchildren.

"We are fortunate that we live in a society where... mutual support has existed and continues to exist," he said.

"The public commemoration of Yom Hashoah this year in Quebec strengthens these ties, and speaks with heartfelt importance to the humble words 'never again' and 'never forget.' "

The day of events included a luncheon hosted by Charbonneau at the parliamentary restaurant, where he said that although Quebec's motto is "Je me souviens" (I remember), a more apt one for Yom Hashoah would be "Je dois me souvenir" (I must remember).

At the luncheon, presided over by PQ MNA Rita Dionne-Marsolais, Bergman and Boulerice were presented with mementos.

Dorothy Zalcman Howard, chair of Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region, presented a Holocaust-themed work of art to Charbonneau painted by Yehouda Chaki. The painting will be hung in the national assembly building.

Following the luncheon, the Jewish community delegation spent 45 minutes in a private meeting with Bouchard and Vice-Premier Bernard Landry, where two Holocaust survivors recounted their personal stories.

One of them, Sidney Zoltak, was quoted as saying that the Holocaust has left him with "a pain I cannot describe."

He said remembering the Holocaust is vital, to make sure "it will not be repeated in the 21st century, the 22nd century, not ever."

Acknowledging a sensitive issue

A few weeks back, we paid tribute to Victor Rabinovitch, who was appointed the head of the Museum of Civilization. Readers will recall we anticipated that Jewish organizations would likely call on him to champion the cause of a stand-alone Holocaust memorial.

Predictably, they did, and as predictably, Rabinovitch offered no comment on Canadian Jewish Congress' publicly voiced expectation for a single Holocaust museum. One can imagine the frustration (chagrin, perhaps?) he must have felt at the time.

Leaving aside the contentious issue of a government-sponsored Holocaust memorial, it does raise a question about the relationship between senior Jewish public servants and the organized Jewish community.

Is it reasonable for the Jewish community to assume or expect that well-placed officials who happen to be co-religionists would always be responsive to the community's agenda?

Obviously, much depends on what is being asked in any particular circumstance. But generally speaking, are such expectations legitimate? Is there a specific line that determines a legitimate appeal, seeking advice or information, for example, from one that is unethical?

Scene in Ottawa

By G.K. SIMCOE

What about the impact that such possible relationships could have on the official? Would involvement in any discussions place the official's reputation at risk? Even more to the point, would community approaches pit someone's Jewish loyalties against their professional obligations?

Should Jewish community leaders disqualify themselves from seeking access to policy decision-makers who happen to be Jewish?

These are not idle philosophical musings! Between the PMO and the Privy Council Office there are almost a dozen Jews in senior positions. There isn't a department on the federal level that does not have Jews among its senior staff involved in policy making.

Ultimately, one must assume that Jewish bureaucrats act as professionally in their relationships with Jewish organizations as they do with other lobbying organizations.

Still, it would be nice to know that Jewish organizations acknowledge the sensitive nature of the issue and reflect carefully on how they ought to approach Jewish officials in the pursuit of their agendas.

Clearly, the museum episode suggests that they haven't acknowledged it yet.

East is East

אליפות העולם בנדמה לי

'Memories link generations' at Montreal service

By MICHAEL REGENSTREIF
Special to The CJN

MONTREAL — As Jews "we choose on Yom Hashoah to remember as a community. Our memories link the generations," said Rabbi Leigh Lerner.

Yom Hashoah

On erev Yom Hashoah – Holocaust Remembrance Day – members of the Jewish community, from young children to the very senior, gathered to remember the six million Jews murdered by Hitler's Nazi regime.

Many who filled Congregation Tifereth Beth David Jerusalem to capacity were Holocaust survivors joined by their children, grandchildren and great-grandchildren.

In his opening remarks, Rabbi Lerner, of Temple Emanu-El-Beth Sholom, quoted Elie Weisel – to forget the Holocaust would be to let the Holocaust win.

Jews, he said, "are prisoners of memory, but we choose freely to remember."

Shlomo Avital, Israel's consul general in Montreal, said Yom Hashoah reminds us of the link "between the greatest tragedy of the Jewish people and the emergence of a strong Jewish nation that arose from the Holocaust."

Avital also reminded the assembly of the recent trial of revisionist historian David Irving, who said that the Holocaust "was a Jewish invention created to seek profit from the international community."

Our duty, Avital said, "is to perpetually remind the world that the Holocaust must never happen again." The State of Israel, he added, is the best guarantee that the Holocaust will not recur.

Sara Weinberg, co-chair of the Montreal Holocaust Memorial Centre's remembrance committee, reminded Holocaust survivors that their "personal eye-witness accounts," in journals, on audio and video tapes, are of "utmost importance" in preserving our collective memory. "We must remember," said Weinberg, "for those who survived and for those who did not."

Sidney Zoltak, the committee's other co-chair, added that "to remember is to honour." He also called on the community "to remember the righteous among nations" who risked their own lives to save Jews, including Zoltak's own family.

Three generations were represented in a solemn candlelighting service. Six memorial candles representing six million murdered Jews were lit by three people – a Holocaust survivor, a child and a grandchild of survivors.

Following the candlelighting, Marilyn Blumer, president, and Steven Cummings, first vice-president, of FEDERATION CJA, read a few of the names of the six million victims.

Personal memories of the Holocaust were offered by three survivors: In Yiddish by Babey Trepman, in French by Régine Frankel and in English by Liselotte Ivry.

Ivry, who was a schoolgirl in Prague in 1939, recalled the names of some of her classmates and teachers who lost their lives in the Nazi death camps.

There were also readings of Holocaust texts, in French, English, Yiddish and Hebrew, by a group of children and grandchildren of survivors.

As the program drew to a close, the memorial service was sung by Cantor Moishe Yom Shur of Congregation Beth Israel Beth Aaron, Tehillim were read by Rabbi Barry Gelman of Congregation Shaar Hashomayim and Kaddish was recited by Joseph Remer, a Holocaust survivor.

Linking the various segments of the program were songs of the Holocaust, sung movingly in Yiddish by the children of the Akiva School Choir, conducted by Alan Iny and accompanied by pianist Stephen Glass.

The service was organized by the Montreal Holocaust Memorial Centre under the auspices of the Consulate General of Israel in Montreal, with the co-operation of Jewish organizations and congregations in the community.

HOLOCAUST STUDY: Joseph Kichler, a survivor of the Holocaust, spoke to the grade 6 students at the Leo Baeck Day School recently. This was part of their study of the Holocaust and the novel Daniel's Story.

Nova Scotia recognizes importance of the day

By JOEL JACOBSON
Atlantic Correspondent

HALIFAX — Philip Riteman choked back tears as he spoke of his experiences at German death camps during Yom Hashoah ceremonies in Halifax.

Yom Hashoah

Before a vast audience of Jews and Christians at Shaar Shalom Synagogue, Riteman, a survivor of Birkenau and Auschwitz, said, "You have no idea" several times as he described the sparse daily food rations, the cramped sleeping quarters, the scant clothing, and the horror of seeing people beaten, brutalized and killed in front of his eyes.

Yom Hashoah in Halifax occurred on the same day the Nova Scotia Legislature passed Bill 27, recognizing Yom Hashoah as Holocaust Memorial Day in Nova Scotia. Holocaust Memorial Day will be commemorated each year on a date determined by the Jewish lunar calendar.

Riteman, interned in 1942 at 14 years of age, lost his parents, five brothers, two sisters and all his aunts, uncles and cousins in the Holocaust. He was selected for labour.

"My heart is broken," he said. "I miss them all terribly."

The armies of the United States and Canada saw the death camps, he said.

"How anyone could deny this is beyond my imagination."

He concluded, "I wish everyone would love each other. There should be no hate on this planet. We must teach our young generation not to hate."

It was also a ceremony where The Most Reverend Terrence Prendergast, S.J., Archbishop of Halifax, begged the forgiveness of Jews everywhere for the anti-Semitism and hatred directed against them "by Christians, at any time or place."

Lt.-Gov. James Kinley, who signed Bill 27 into law earlier in the day in the legislature, read the proclamation aloud for the audience.

Victor Goldberg, president of the Atlantic Jewish Council, asked Archbishop Prendergast to join with him in lighting the first of six candles to remember the six million Jews and others murdered in the Holocaust.

Candles were lit and the names of slain children were read by Cara Tax, president of Shaar Shalom Synagogue; Gerry Mendleson, president of Beth Israel Synagogue; Mike Stern, representing Jewish youth; Atlantic Provinces Jewish Student Federation representative Laura Gergely and survivor Helena Jochel; and Riteman and his son Larry.

Between musical presentations and poetry readings, Jack Silverstone, the executive vice-president and general counsel of Canadian Jewish Congress, stressed that the lessons of the Holocaust have yet to be learned.

"We see genocide in Rwanda, Cambodia, and the former Yugoslavia, and we wonder. Holocaust survivors see the reality better than anyone."

He praised survivors for "unlocking the horrors in their souls every day to recount their time in hell, so we will not forget."

Similar ceremonies were held in other Atlantic communities, including St. John's, Nfld.; Moncton, Saint John and Fredericton, N.B.; and, for the first time, in Prince Edward Island and Cape Breton.

Bonds with different people recognized

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — The annual Holocaust memorial service this year served as an opportunity to recognize bonds with people of different backgrounds.

The community-wide event, organized by the Ottawa Shoah (Holocaust) remembrance committee of the Jewish Community Council of Ottawa/Vaad Ha'Ir, was opened with a colour party of the Jewish War Veterans, followed by the singing of Tehillim by Cantor Daniel Benlolo of Congregation Beth Shalom West.

The evening included an original dramatic presentation titled We Fought Back, performed by local young people and directed by Shirley Schildkraut and Shoah remembrance committee chair Fuzzy Teitelbaum, as well as several readings. Rabbi Howard Finkelstein of Congregation Beth Shalom West addressed the audience.

Several survivors and their families lit candles in memory of the relatives they lost in the Shoah and of those for whom there are no survivors.

Ria Euverman, daughter of the late Arie Van Mansum, a Christian who in his youth risked his life to save the lives of many Jews, presented the Arie Van Mansum Memorial Award for Education, 2000 to Malcolm Lawrence.

Euverman spoke of her late father's deep belief in God and his wish that any credit for his good deeds be given not to him, but to God for guiding him to do so.

Lawrence, the award recipient, is a teacher who has taken it upon himself to teach the Holocaust to his students. In accepting the award, he explained the bond he feels between the Jewish and Black communities. He said he remembers how in the '60s, during the civil rights marches, Jews marched along with Blacks and lost their lives together.

The evening ended with the singing of O Canada and Hatikva. The Shoah Book of Survivors, listing the names and families of local survivors, was on display in the foyer following the ceremony.

Young Winnipegger travels to Poland to volunteer with Jewish community

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG – Poland! "To most Jews living outside the country, merely uttering the word seems to bring to mind a sense of lost memories, a temple of thought destroyed, a civilization decimated," wrote Sol Nagler a couple of months back in an American Joint Distribution publication.

For the young Winnipegger who is actually working in Poland, the reality has turned out to be quite different. Rather than finding himself in a mass Jewish graveyard, he has found himself part of a small but growing Jewish community.

Whereas the community was estimated to be about 4,000 just a few short years ago, since Poland threw off the yoke of Communism, numerous Jews have come out of the closet.

"The best current estimate is that there are about 13,000 Jews in Poland," says Sol's father, Winnipeg businessman Murray Nagler. "A lot of them are young Jews who are just starting to discover who they are and what being Jewish is all about. There is a lot of interest in Judaism."

Nagler's role is to foster that interest on behalf of the JDC and the Lauder Foundation. He first traveled to Poland early last year, says his father.

Nagler had graduated from the University of Manitoba with an honours degree in philosophy and was traveling through Europe. His intention was to go to Poland to learn about where his maternal grandparents, Holocaust survivors, came from.

The rabbi in a synagogue he attended in east Berlin encouraged him to contact representatives of the Lauder Foundation. (The foundation is headed by Ron Lauder, son of cosmetics queen Estee Lauder.)

Fate quickly took a hand for Nagler. While sitting in a restaurant shortly after his arrival in Warsaw, he spotted two men wearing yarmulkes coming into the restaurant. One of them was the president of the Warsaw Jewish community.

The gentleman encouraged Nagler to visit him in his office the next day and subsequently persuaded the young Winnipegger to stay in Warsaw for a while and donate his time to working with the community, in conjunction with JDC staff.

Before Nagler left Poland, his new friends from the JDC took him out to dinner and encouraged him to apply for the Jewish Service Core (JSC) program run by the JDC out of New York.

The program recruits people to work with Jewish communities overseas. Last September, Nagler returned to Poland for a year as a JSC volunteer. His work entails helping members of the Jewish community develop projects, such as seminars related to holiday and Shabbat programs.

He works closely with the Polish Union of Jewish Students on outreach programs and leadership seminars.

Murray visited his son in January. "It is an interesting country," he says. "Sol is learning Polish and has made a number of good friends. He loves the country and has become part of the Jewish community."

Outremont councillor tries to block construction of new shul

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Councillor Céline Forget is once again battling the Amour Pour Israel Congregation.

The small chassidic group in Outremont is going ahead with construction of a synagogue, even though the city councillor has gone to court to revoke the congregation's building permit.

As a result of Forget's earlier legal action, the congregation moved last September from its premises at the corner of Durocher and Lajoie avenues, where it had been located for almost 10 years.

As a private citizen back in 1997, Forget had sued the congregation for operating a synagogue in a residential zone, which was a violation of city bylaws. Forget had been a tenant in the building, which had two floors of apartments above the street-level synagogue, since 1995.

Just before the case was to come before Quebec Superior Court last June, the congregation of about 40 members announced it would leave and convert a mixed commercial and residential building a block away into a synagogue and apartment complex.

Forget, who was elected to council as an independent last November, is now suing Outremont. She is asking Superior Court to quash the permit the city gave the congregation because she claims the project does not conform to the regulations.

Jack Hartstein, spokesperson for Amour Pour Israel, said Forget's action will not halt the project. Work began on schedule in March on the four-storey building on Van Horne Avenue, at the corner of Durocher, which is within Forget's district.

Work began on schedule

The work involves converting the ground and second floors into a synagogue, adding a half-storey above, and extending the building into a neighboring lot, Hartstein said. The upper floors will be rented out.

He expects the project to be completed in about a year. The legal case could take anywhere from two to five years to make its way through court.

Hartstein said it is clear to him, with this new legal foray, that Forget's motive is to make life difficult for Chassidim in the area. "It's obvious now what her goal was all along. We gave in to her demand to leave (from Lajoie) and moved a long city block away, and she is still trying to get rid of us.

"I am surprised that she actually came out and did this."

Last year, tensions between Forget and Amour Pour Israel and some other chassidic groups were made public when Hartstein alleged that his community felt it was being harassed and intimidated by Forget.

Besides the earlier lawsuit, he claimed Forget was making numerous complaints to the police against the community for parking, noise and littering infractions that were either petty or unfounded.

No rezoning was required for the work on the Van Horne building, because at the time it was bought by the congregation in September, it was permissible to use it as a place of worship. However, since the construction permit was granted, Outremont adopted new zoning bylaws prohibiting more places of worship on that street.

"We have acquired rights [for that site]. We have legal opinions to that effect. We're 100 percent on solid ground," Hartstein said.

The congregation was granted a construction permit in March, over Forget's demand that the council delay the project for further study.

Forget says she is merely doing the city's job by seeing that its bylaws are enforced and is using the courts as a last resort. She issued a press release stating she doubts the current project is in accordance with municipal bylaws and regulations.

Mayor Jérôme Unterberg said the city obtained a legal opinion before issuing the permit; he does not think Forget will win her case.

Filmmaker expresses personal protest to Iran

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — In an unmistakable gesture of disgust over the current espionage trial of 13 Jews in Iran, filmmaker Joseph Koenig has returned an award he won at an Iranian film festival several years ago.

Last week, as the suspects charged with spying for Israel glumly filed into a Revolutionary Court in the city of Shiraz convened to determine their fate, Koenig packed a trophy and a diploma into a box and dispatched it by courier to Mohammed Lavasani, Iran's ambassador to Canada.

Joe Koenig

Koenig is a former National Film Board of Canada writer and producer whose production company made The Apprenticeship of Duddy Kravitz. He won the Golden Book Trophy at the 1993 Roshd International Film Festival for Energy and Matter.

His 1966 educational documentary explored the relationship between these forces in a way that could easily be understood by elementary and high school students, Koenig explained.

"I wanted to express my dismay over this staged affair, this political show trial," he said with a touch of anger.

Not a shred of evidence has been presented against the Jews, noted Koenig, currently the chief executive officer of Electronics Workbench, a Toronto software company.

In his estimation, the trial is little more than a crude attempt by Islamic hardliners to undermine the leadership of President Mohammed Khatami, widely regarded as a moderate committed to the rule of law and the democratic process.

"I don't think the defendants will get a fair trial," he observed. "There's a commitment to convict them in this cooked-up, spurious trial. It's so shameful when people do these kinds of things. I'm trying to show my disgust."

Koenig, who did not personally attend the Roshd film festival, was pleasantly surprised to receive the Iranian prize, consisting of a 10-inch high trophy and a diploma, signed by Minister of Education Mohammed Ali Najafi.

As he put it in a letter to Lavasani: "It made me feel that doors long shut (in Iran) were perhaps reopening and that there were renewed opportunities for people of good will to share ideas for the benefit of all.

"It also made me feel that in some small way, this little educational film, made 27 years earlier, had played a small role as a cultural bridge builder in our complex world, where it is so hard to create and so easy to destroy.

"Although educational films I have helped to make have won over 20 international awards, this is one of the very few I kept in my office because of the special positive message it conveyed to me."

Koenig, who specialized in live action and animation films while at the Montreal-based National Film Board of Canada from 1955 to 1969, informed the Iranian envoy that he was returning the trophy and the diploma with much sadness.

"It is the only way to add my voice to those who protest the long delayed 'spy' trial in Iran, in which the majority of the accused are Jews, as I am.

Describing the trial as an "immoral event," Koenig said that its instigators are "doing their best to embarrass and intimidate the people and even the government of Iran and to undermine the growing relationship between Iran and other societies."

He ended the letter with the following phrase, "Kindly convey this personal message of profound disappointment and sorrow to your colleagues in Iran."

During his tenure at the National Film Board of Canada, Koenig developed a large program of short experimental films for children with a variety of learning difficulties, in collaboration with two psychologists, Sam Rabinovitch and Margie Golick of the Montreal Children's Hospital.

First Jewish lieutenant-governor

Freeman, whose husband Larry, served as president of the Atlantic Jewish Council for two, two-year terms, has served on community committees and boards such as the World Figure Skating Championships in 1990, the Kidney Foundation, Grace Maternity Hospital, and the Atlantic Theatre Festival. She is still on the board of the Nova Scotia Division Duke of Edinburgh Awards and Nova Scotia Talent Trust.

A strong believer in Jewish tradition, she will decide soon about changing the Government House kitchen for kashruth purposes.

"I'm a traditional Jew and have no intention of giving up those traditions.

I fully intend to maintain my Jewish practices. I certainly won't compromise my values."

But she says she's just learning about the job and is unaware of all the demands.

"When I think back to our ancestors fleeing pogroms to come here, with just the clothes on their backs, and leading a sheltered life in Canada, speaking little English, but working hard to provide a better life for their children, I realize it's our generation who must contribute to the country that accepted us."

Her three college age children, Princeton-graduate Daniel, now working in China, fourth-year McGill student Jonathan and sophomore McGill student Debra, are thrilled, she says.

"But Debra will be the only one to live in our new home this summer. The others are away. They'll all be home for the installation, though."

Freeman's new job pays $97,500 per year with another $25,000 for expenses.

She will have aides-de-camp to attend her every need while on duty, including driving the vice-regal car.

"Anyone who knows me knows I love to drive. I find it very relaxing. It may be difficult for me not to drive," she laughed.

Israel Bonds supporting liver research at U of M

Gala planned for May 18

WINNIPEG — While the main purpose of the State of Israel Bonds is to help the State of Israel, a secondary purpose is to contribute to the community as a whole, said Shoshana Shalev-Minuk, executive director of the State of Israel Bonds office in Winnipeg.

The organization's gala Celebration of Life evening will be held May 18 at the Lombard Hotel and will raise close to $500,000 toward the establishment of an endowed chair in liver diseases research at the Health Sciences Centre in Winnipeg, Shalev-Minuk said.

"That is 25 percent of our total goal. This is just the kickoff dinner," she said. "It is a great start to our 2000 & Beyond Campaign."

Highlights of the Celebration of Life evening include a performance by tenor Michael Burgess, star of Les Miserables.

Presentation of the Celebration of Life Awards will be made to Drs. Gerald Minuk, Kelly Kaita, Ari Cohen, Jeremy Lipschitz, Yuewen Gong and Barry Rosser, the physicians who are part of the HSC liver department, the leading liver department in Canada.

Minuk, the founder of the 10-year-old department, just returned last week from a sabbatical doing research at the Technion Institute in Haifa. He is a graduate of the medical school at the University of Manitoba and received his training as a liver specialist at the National Institute of Health in Bethesda, Maryland.

He began his career in 1977 in Calgary where he started a liver program. He came home to Winnipeg in 1987 to start a similar program here. He personally recruited the other physicians working in the unit.

Liver disease is the fourth most common cause of death among Manitobans.

Minuk is particularly concerned about finding a cure for Hepatitis C which afflicts 300 million people worldwide and has a high morbidity rate. The endowed chair is intended for the recruitment of a world-class researcher.

About Nutrition

By LISA WEINBERG

Q. I am finding it very difficult to come up with school lunches for my children. They are restricted to bringing only non-meat and nut-free lunches, but deli sandwiches are their preference. Do you have any advice?

A. First, think beyond the typical sandwich. Great lunches can be made from last night's leftovers, like pasta, rice, vegetables, soups, salads, casseroles and potato dishes. Also if your children like deli sandwiches, try the soy deli slices. They are available in a variety of flavours, and may resemble such meats as bologna, salami and turkey. These really do taste, smell and look like the real thing, and they are much healthier in many cases.

Q. I have a fabulous recipe for a sour cream coffee cake, but I know that it is high in fat and also has lactose. My daughter just found out that she is lactose intolerant. Is there a reasonable substitution that will not compromise the flavour or texture?

A. Plain yogurt is the perfect solution. It is both lactose free and low in fat, and the cake will taste and turn out exactly the same. I use yogurt in place of sour cream all the time in coffee cake recipes.

Tissue engineering research being used to create an artificial heart

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — And you thought Star Trek was science fiction!

Michael Sefton, director of the Institute of Biomaterials and Biomedical Engineering, and a professor in the department of chemical engineering and applied chemistry at the University of Toronto, told The CJN that research is being done now to combine live cells with plastics to create artificial organs such as the heart, a technique known as tissue engineering.

The idea of developing an artificial heart using this technique, he said, came to him at 3 a.m., when he was trying to figure out "what comes next" in the field.

"Scientists have been working on creating skin replacements for burn victims, and artificial muscles to treat incontinence in the elderly," he said. Logically, then, large organs, such as the liver, kidneys, or lungs, could be tackled as well.

It would entail an "ambitious, large-scale" effort such as the human genome project, in which institutions around the world collaborated to map the genetic code.

"It would be the same with the heart – the different parts of the research would be combined into the final result.

"The key premise is that it is a global project. The steering committee includes researchers from the United States, Canada, Japan, and Europe, and soon from Israel."

He chose the heart as a research subject for several reasons. One of the major ones was the fund-raising possibilities, he said. "We realized we would have to appeal to governments around the world."

A meeting in Toronto last summer launched The L.I.F.E. Initiative (Living Implants From Engineering). At the moment, it is in the organizational phase.

While a formal program to create an artificial heart is not yet underway, Sefton said, research is being done that will be integrated into the project. For instance, he said, researchers at U of T are trying to grow heart muscles.

"The L.I.F.E. Initiative will fill in the gaps between the research that is being carried on at different universities.

One of the major obstacles to overcome is that of the body's rejection of foreign matter. One way to deal with that problem is to use the patient's own cells, an approach he calls "the least likely." Another, is to biopsy some cells and genetically modify them to make them immunologically neutral, so that they can build heart cells, for instance.

The most exciting approach, said Sefton, is to use embryonic stem cells, cells harvested at a very early stage of gestation. These stem cells, he said, can grow into any other kind of cells.

While the much-heralded cloning technology is "unlikely" to be used to clone a whole person, said Sefton, he believes that it will be possible to clone individual cells which would be used in various kinds of biomedical techniques.

The use of man-made materials, such as in the Jarvik artificial heart, has not proved terribly successful, Sefton said. "A quasi-natural heart would be more adaptable and, unlike plastic, would be able to grow, which is especially useful in children."

Sefton, like most scientists, he said, is conscious of the ethical concerns that arise from medical research. For instance, he said, is it ethically and halachically correct to tissue engineer organs at all, or is it "playing God?"

The concern boils down in large part, he says, to "what you are trying to accomplish, rather than making a blanket decision on the issue."

Most scientists feel that they are not qualified to make these judgements, and are happy to have ethical discussions going on apart from scientific work, Sefton said, adding that all research is considered by ethics committees.

Iranian "confessions" follow predicted pattern

By MICHAEL J. JORDAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — While the events unfolding 8,000 miles away in the espionage trial of 13 Iranian Jews have shocked many North American Jews, the trial is following a script prepared earlier this year, said a Jewish leader monitoring the events.

Last week Wednesday, a second and third prisoner "confessed" to spying for Israel and its foreign intelligence agency, Mossad, "out of love" for the Jewish state. Western observers, however, charge that the confessions were either extracted under duress, or with promises of leniency – or both.

"We were told this would happen several months ago – they would not have their own lawyers, the trial would be behind closed doors with no foreign observers let in and there would be confessions," said Malcolm Hoenlein, executive vice chairman of the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations.

Hoenlein, who has spearheaded efforts to secure the release of the "Iran 13," said he receives his intelligence from Iranian sources close to the hardline authorities who control the court system.

Following last week's proceedings, one of those who "confessed," part-time Hebrew teacher Shahrokh Paknahad, told reporters waiting outside: "We were told by Israeli intelligence that if any of us under any circumstances were arrested, we must deny everything and they would help to get us out by bringing to bear international pressure. But that was just lies."

Paknahad, 23, described by one judiciary official as one of the alleged spy ring's "ideologues," added, "What I can say on behalf of myself and the others is that we are unhappy and sad and repentant."

The third man to "confess" was Ramin Nemati, 23.

Shakrokh Paknahad

Their statements came after the purported confession of the alleged leader, Hamid "Dani" Tefileen. A devoutly religious man from the southern city of Shiraz, Tefileen admitted to visiting Israel in 1994.

Interviewed by state television after last week's hearing on Monday, Tefileen reportedly also admitted to being trained and paid by the Mossad. After the hearing, the authorities assailed him of carrying out this work for "the love of Israel" – and for the money.

Israel, for its part, steadfastly denies the link.

"We don't have anything new to say from what we have said in the past," Israeli Foreign Ministry spokesperson Aviv Sharon told reporters in Israel.

"We don't have any connection with any of those who stand trial now in Iran."

But it was Tefileen's trip to Israel that seems to be, from Iran's perspective, the smoking gun for the entire case, said Hoenlein.

"Without him, there's no case," he said. "Getting him to confess was crucial."

Tefileen has not yet been sentenced, though state television said he had asked for clemency.

Observers believe that Tefileen, an impoverished trader, may have been facing other trumped-up charges, like drug possession or smuggling.

He may have been offered leniency if he confessed to the spying charge. Or perhaps the freedom of his brother, Omid, was dangled before him.

Omid is one of three accused Jews who was released on bail in February, and is likely to be pardoned.

Either way, said Hoenlein, Tefileen and the rest are innocent.

"If this doesn't give all the appearances of a setup, I don't know what is," said Hoenlein. "Listen, you sit in jail for a year, in conditions no one knows about. How can we judge someone in that situation?"

Faramarz Kashi, also a part-time Hebrew teacher, was scheduled to be brought before the Revolutionary Court on May 8, when the trial was to reconvene.

One issue that remains unclear, said Hoenlein, is whether those who "confess" will take the fall for the rest or if the entire group will be punished. The sentence for spying ranges from six months to death.

PM, Arafat try to break deadlock

By AMNON BARZILAI
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Ehud Barak and Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat met last Sunday night in Ramallah to try to bridge the differences between the sides and advance the talks on the framework agreement for a permanent settlement.

U.S. peace envoy Dennis Ross met with Barak on Sunday; he had met with Arafat on Friday.

Political sources in Jerusalem said before the meeting that only talks between the two leaders can bring about a meaningful breakthrough on the issues in contention. At the same time, they said it was doubtful that Sunday's meeting would produce such a breakthrough.

The meeting was described by the Prime Minister's Office as a "natural step" in the peace process.

According to the revised peace timetable, the framework agreement between the two sides was supposed to be signed by the end of this month. The current assessment, however, is that it will not be signed before the end of June or July.

The next significant date is Sept. 13, when Arafat intends to declare an independent Palestinian state.

Sources in Jerusalem said no real progress will be made in the talks on the Palestinian track until Barak's forthcoming visit to the United States for talks with President Bill Clinton.

Sunday's meeting came in the wake of 10 days of talks in Eilat. Following the talks, the Palestinians accused Israel of stalling and said virtually no progress had been made.

Political sources in Jerusalem said the Palestinians were trying to generate a crisis atmosphere in an attempt to make the Americans increase their involvement in the process.

Custody battle raises issue of religious heritage

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A bitter custody battle with echoes of the Elian Gonzalez case has prompted an outpouring of solidarity among Orthodox Jewish organizations internationally, as well as anger at Italian authorities for allegedly permitting two young sisters to be deprived of their religious heritage.

Organizations including the U.S.-based Ohr Somayach, the Orthodox Union and Agudath Israel have sided with the mother in the case involving Nitzan and Danielle Dulberg. In Europe, the Conference of European Rabbis has joined the fray, supporting the mother's position that she should raise the girls in an Orthodox environment.

Tali Pikan-Rosenberg

In Canada, businessman Mark Mandelbaum has undertaken an informal fund-raising campaign to raise money for the mother's legal costs, while Kurt Rothschild, chair of Mercaz Olami of World Mizrachi, has written to Israeli Attorney General Eliyakim Rubenstein, asking that Israel intervene to "stand up for the rights of Jews wherever they may be." The Beth Jacob girls school in Toronto has raised awareness of the case among students and organized the recitation of Tehillim (psalms) in solidarity with the sisters.

The case has even involved Pope John Paul II, who was asked by Israel's chief rabbis during his recent visit to Israel to help in protecting the girls' religious rights.

Like the Gonzalez imbroglio, the Dulberg case touches upon issues of parental rights and the child-rearing environment. Unlike the Gonzalez case, which involved a six-year-old, the Dulberg sisters are 11 and 14, and have expressed a desire to be with their mother, Tali Pikan-Rosenberg.

Pikan-Rosenberg, a baalat tshuvah who lives in Israel, alleges her former husband, Moshe Dulberg, has converted to Christianity and is preventing their daughters from living an Orthodox lifestyle.

The allegation concerning her husband's alleged conversion has been repeated by various Jewish groups on their Web sites, though the evidence is scanty and Dulberg's lawyer has denied it.

The case, meanwhile, is winding its way through the Italian legal system, with several courts adjudicating a variety of issues.

The Venice Juvenile Court has granted Moshe Dulberg sole guardianship of the daughters while limiting Pikan-Rosenberg's access to her daughters. Jewish organizations contend that the Italian courts relied, at least in part, on a prejudiced view of traditional Judaism to support decisions that favoured the father.

Rabbi Sriel Rosenberg

In an angry statement on behalf of the Conference of European Rabbis, the late lord and rabbi Immanuel Jakobovits wrote last year that the courts have rejected the mother's claim "because it is alleged she belongs to 'a religious cult', i.e. Orthodox Judaism. This assertion is libelous and utterly untenable...

"We assert that in Jewish law children assume the faith of their mother and must be raised accordingly...The injustice of placing these children into an impossible situation, including the restricted manner in which they are allowed to communicate with their mother, is a total denial of their human rights as well as of their Jewish tradition."

Chief rabbis asked Pope to intervene

In Toronto, Mandelbaum echoes those sentiments. "It's a situation that is offensive, that she lost her rights to her children because of her faith."

Mandelbaum, who by chance met Pikan-Rosenberg during a visit to Italy last year, said "it's a very explosive case in Italy."

Orthodox groups believe there is evidence the father has been baptized, and the Italian courts believe the children should remain with the father in Italy and "be brought up in an Italian atmosphere."

"It seems to me, the courts in Italy deprived her of her rights as a parent. They look at her and see her as an Orthodox Jew and they see it as almost a Medieval practice."

Mandelbaum acknowledged that the couple, who are originally from Israel, were secular Jews when they married.

From a distance, the facts of the case remain murky and depend on which version of events you accept. The Orthodox organizations have devoted kilobytes of space to the case on their Web sites (www.ohr.org.il/special/misc/dulberg.htm or www.orthodoxunion.org/public/statements/1999/dulbergcaseinbrief.htm are two examples).

In one decision that was overturned on jurisdictional grounds, the Juvenile Court of Genoa painted a less than sterling portrait of Pikan-Rosenberg. Reciting the facts of the case, the court found that in 1982 the parents were married in Israel, where their first daughter was born. They moved to Italy where the second daughter was born. In 1991 the parents separated and entered into a separation agreement that provided for joint custody. The girls' primary residence was with the mother, and she agreed not to move without her husband's consent.

From 1991 to 1995 she moved seven times in Italy. Eventually she married a man belonging to the Lubavitch movement.

In August 1996, Moshe Dulberg asked Juvenile court for custody of the girls. In December 1996, while the case was still before the courts, Pikan-Rosenberg took the children on a visit to Israel with the permission of her husband. While she was there, she informed the court she did not intend to return to Italy. The Juvenile Court of Genoa granted custody of the girls to their father.

Ottawa groups oppose Italian courts' decisions

Pursuing remedies under the Hague Convention, which limits the right of a parent to move a child without the consent of the other parent, Dulberg received an order of the Court of Tel Aviv to return the children to him.

By this time, Pikan-Rosenberg had divorced her second husband and had moved to Buenos Aires, and later to Sao Paulo. Afterwards, she returned to Israel and married Rabbi Sriel Rosenberg, who already had 13 children of his own.

Israeli police eventually located the children and with an Israeli court order, returned the children to their father.

In rendering its decision last year, the Genoa Juvenile Court rejected suggestions the issue was one of religious upbringing. "The primary purpose of this investigation is to assess which of the parents is better fit to function as such," the court stated. "Rarely has the Juvenile Court seen such a harmful behaviour to the interests of the children such as that of Tali Pikan-Rosenberg."

The court found that the mother "abducted her daughters" and that before settling with her third husband in Bnei Brak, Pikan-Rosenberg changed addresses 12 times. As a result, the children "lived in isolation from the rest of the world," relied almost exclusively on their mother and were psychologically dependent on her everything.

The court also found:

- that the mother engaged in "the systematic destruction of the paternal figure" – in effect, poisoning the girls against their father;
- that the girls' religious upbringing was made "without the approval of the father and is a severe violation of parental duties;"
- that "the religious community to which Pikan-Rosenberg belongs is indeed...a closed group which keeps contact only with homogeneous groups characterized by similar lifestyles."

The court ruled "the mother to be absolutely unfit for adequately carrying out her parental function, both with regard to education and to whatever concerns the care of her children, in the light of universally accepted pedagogical and psychological principles: namely, respect for the individual, for personal potentials; acquisition of a critical mindset and of adequate tools to interpret the real world; plurality of behavioural models; constant role models, also with regard to affectivity and the possibility of establishing social relations; respect of pluralism of ideas and behaviour; need for an affectively warm environment which cares for the girls' needs, also in terms of a proper diet and a healthy and active life."

The Week in Israel

May 1

• The IDF began tearing down two outposts in southern Lebanon to prepare for its planned troop withdrawal.

• Prime Minister Ehud Barak held a late-night meeting with Rav Ovadia Yosef in an effort to secure his support and the support of Shas for the government's peace talks with the Palestinians.

May 2

• Yom Hashoah V'gvurah

• Talks with the Palestinians taking place in Eilat were put on the back burner because of Yom Hashoah.

May 3

• Intel is seeking to expand its microchip plant in Israel at a cost of between $2.5 and $3.5 billion (US).

• An official from India's commerce ministry, in Tel Aviv for a trade fair, said his country could use Israel's expertise in irrigation, solar energy and fiber optics technology. The current $1-billion (US) level of annual trade is "just the tip of the iceberg," the envoy said.

May 4

• The Ministry of Finance unveiled recommendations for sweeping tax reform. The centrepiece of the reforms is a 25 percent capital gains tax.

• IDF forces bombed infrastructure installations in Lebanon in retaliation for the firing by Hezbollah of dozens of rockets into Kiryat Shmonah that killed one soldier and injured some 27 people.

May 5

• Sri Lanka announced it would resume official ties with Israel as of next week.

On the occasion of Israel's 52nd Independence Day

Ehud Barak
Prime Minister of the State of Israel

Dear Friends,

It is with tremendous pride and a great deal of optimism that we celebrate the 52nd anniversary of the independence of the State of Israel. We are on the cusp of an exciting period in the history of our country.

We continue to travel the difficult road to peace with vigour and determination. Our finest security experts and negotiators are dedicating a great deal of time to this task. We are hopeful that our neighbours will join us in taking the courageous decisions necessary to bring real and secure peace to our people and to the region.

With the ingathering of so many new immigrants, we are rapidly integrating not only wonderful gifts of culture and diversity, but also the human resources of intelligence and creativity that are benefiting our society in many ways. We are excelling in the field of research and development, in medicine and science; we are on the cutting edge of high-technology; and, we are revitalizing artistic expression.

Today, as has been true since the founding of the state, we remain committed to the close partnership and common agenda that we share with Jewish communities around the world. We are playing an active role in Jewish education and renaissance in those places where Jewish life was threatened. We encourage through innovative programs more and more Jewish youth coming to Israel to cement their connection to the Jewish homeland and to their own Jewish identity.

We know that together, in Israel's 52nd year, we will meet the challenges that face us as a community and as a state. It is for us to provide our children with a better, secure and more prosperous future. Let us pass the torch of Jewish responsibility and love for Zion with an enthusiasm that reflects the beauty of our tradition and the tremendous promise that Israel at peace and a strong Jewish people can bring.

Shalom and Chag Samayach.

At 52, Israel suffers identity crisis

By AVI MACHLIS
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

As Israelis celebrated Independence Day, there is a feeling that Israel's 53rd year will bring an intense debate about the nature of the Jewish state and the future evolution of Zionism.

Yom Ha'atzmaut

"The attempt to find a middle road between a Jewish and democratic state will be the essence of the ongoing public debate over Jewish and Israeli identity," said Moshe Lissak, professor emeritus of sociology at the Hebrew University in Jerusalem.

"But I don't think that Israeli society is ripe for these discussions because as long as diplomatic arrangements with her neighbours have not been secured, it will be difficult to address these issues in a rational way."

Experts say the debate about the nature of the Jewish state will proceed along two main paths.

First, the very fundamental definition of Israel as a Jewish state is likely to face sharper challenges than ever before from Israeli Arabs, who make up 20 percent of Israel's population of 6 million.

Second, the struggle between religious and secular segments of society toward defining what it means to be a Jewish state will be played out in new ways.

The impetus for the Arab challenge was provided nearly two months ago, when the Qadan family from the Galilee won the right from Israel's High Court of Justice to build a home in Katzir, a Jewish community established by the Jewish Agency for Israel.

With that landmark decision, the Supreme Court shattered one of the fundamental tenets of modern Zionism, which sought to secure land exclusively for Jews. While ruling that it was illegal to discriminate against Arabs in land allocation, the court insisted this did not clash with the Jewish nature of the state.

In fact, Justice Aharon Barak argued that the "Jewish character of the state did not permit Israel to discriminate between its citizens. In Israel, Jews and non-Jews are citizens with equal rights and responsibilities."

Mohammed Baraka, a Knesset member and leader of the predominantly Arab Hadash Party, said Israeli Arabs will now step up their struggle for equal rights; they will also press ahead with a campaign to remove the Jewish symbols of the state: from the Star of David flag to the national anthem Hatikvah to the Jewish Agency itself.

Though Baraka said he understands this strikes at a raw nerve of most Jewish Israelis, he added, "The state can express Jewish national aspirations, but it cannot be a Jewish state if one of every five citizens is an Arab," he said.

At the Jewish Agency – an organization Baraka wants dismantled – the chair, Sallai Meridor, who opposed the Supreme Court ruling, believes Israelis are up to the challenge of the coming debates, even in the face of "post-Zionist" trends that have some history books rewriting what once were sacred beliefs about the heroism of Israel's founders.

"After having built the state physically, we are now moving on to the phase of adding the spiritual content of what it means to be a Jewish and democratic state," he said. "I think this is a very exciting challenge."

While Meridor believes the Jewish state must be particularly sensitive to its non-Jewish population – even using affirmative action at times – he also foresees a growing Arab trend to "de-Zionize and de-Judaize" Israel.

In addition, there will be groups of Israelis who join in and want Israel to relinquish its identity as a Jewish state. Such a threat, he said, could indeed galvanize mainstream support in the opposite direction for a more Jewish state.

"But the true challenge is to choose to be Jewish or to stay Jewish without the external impetus of anti-Semitism, and to be united without enemies," he added.

At the same time as Arab Israelis are driving one aspect of the identity debate, Jewish Israelis are likely to experience a contradictory tug from within as the different cultural, religious or political sectors engage each other too. This will make internal cohesion a difficult task.

A new type of Israeli emerging: high-tech capitalist

Many Israeli Jews believe the same court that gave its nod to the land challenge brought by the Qadan family will also present a different set of challenges for religious and secular Jews.

Yom Ha'atzmaut

Secular Jews feel increasingly threatened by the rising political power of haredi parties. Many see the Supreme Court as a last line of defence against religious politics.

Haredim meanwhile, feel defenseless against an increasingly activist judicial system. On all sides, the rhetoric is ugly.

Ironically, the Haredim, who largely do not attach theological significance to Israel as a Jewish state, are battling harder than ever to maintain the state's relation to Judaism.

Sallai Meridor

Jonathan Rosenblum, director of the Israel office for Am Echad and a commentator for the Jerusalem Post newspaper, explains the paradox.

On the one hand, he said, an increasingly materialistic, secular society with a shrinking connection to Judaism, vindicates the classical haredi rejection of secular Zionism as a replacement for Judaism.

"At the same time, we are fearful that to the extent that people lose any awareness of themselves as Jews as a distinctive entity, it will make it much more difficult to reconstitute the Jewish people around its natural center, which is the Torah," he added.

Rosenblum rejected accusations that Haredim want to create a Jewish theocracy. He sees the group's attitude toward religion and state as performing the role of a teacher.

Meanwhile, beyond the ideological struggles between Jew and Arab and Jew and Jew, there is yet a new type of Israeli emerging: the high-tech capitalist, a breed apart from the socialist-Zionists who were dominant among the founders of the state.

Lissak says Israel's high-tech boom and prosperity have not had a mitigating influence on the ideological conflicts as might have been expected, because only a small number of Israelis actually have a direct stake in the profits.

Aharon Barak

However, Neil Cohen, a partner at Israel Seed Partners, a venture capital fund that raised $180 million last month from top U.S. investors and leading Internet figures, said he believes the high-tech boom is affecting the country in bigger ways – and creating new challenges.

"We have created hundreds, if not thousands, of jobs," said Cohen, who immigrated from London 11 years ago. "It gives us a degree of satisfaction and a feeling of pride that we wouldn't feel if we were in the U.K. or the U.S."

Cohen sees the building of Israel's new economy to be as important a Zionist task as the work of the pioneers was decades ago.

Yet as the money to create jobs flows in, sweeping Israel with it into the trends of globalization, Cohen knows that the ideals of those founding pioneers will be lost on the new Israeli generation.

The first challenge is to bridge the gap between the haves of the new economy and the have nots of the old economy.

"The second is maintaining Jewish identity," he said. "We have been so good at what we've done that all the things that have differentiated us from just any other nation have broken down and we run a risk of becoming just like any other nation."

Insured Annuities - Lifetime Guarantees of 10% Plus

In today's environment of low interest rates and volatile stock makets, many investors seek more attractive and less stressful investments.

If you are at retirement age and trying to maximize spendable income from non-RRSP savings, insured annuities provide the best of both worlds - significantly higher after-tax income for life and the capital guaranteed tax-free to your estate. The older you are, the higher the yield on your investment.

Consider the following example, which compares the investment of $200,000 in a GIC at 6% with an insured annuity, for a man aged 75.

GIC versus Insured Annuity

	GIC	Insured Annuity
Capital	200,000	200,000
Annual Income	12,000	26,300
Taxable Income	12,000	6,600
Tax (50%)	6,000	3,300
After Tax Income	6,000	23,000
Insurance Cost	NIL	11,000
Spendable Income	6,000	12,000
Gross Equivalent Yield	6%	12%
Estate Value	200,000	200,000
Subject to Probate	YES	NO
Guaranteed Period	5 YEARS	LIFE

Effective improved yield on investment = 100%

The purpose of the
is to publicize and promote programmes, activities, and resources from a Jewish perspective for those seeking spiritual, physical and emotional healing.

The Toronto Jewish Community has recognized that Judaism has an enormous amount to say about illness and healing through the study of sacred texts, rabbinic commentary, midrash, music, ritual and stories

"Al Tifrosh Min Hatzibur-
Do not separate yourself from the community."
is never more important than at a time of illness.

Jewish tradition recognizes that, though there is never less to healing than what medical science is capable of, there is more to "healing" than what medicine offers.

The Toronto Jewish Healing Project is not affiliated with any stream of Judaism. It focuses on addressing human needs through the lens that Judaism can offer.

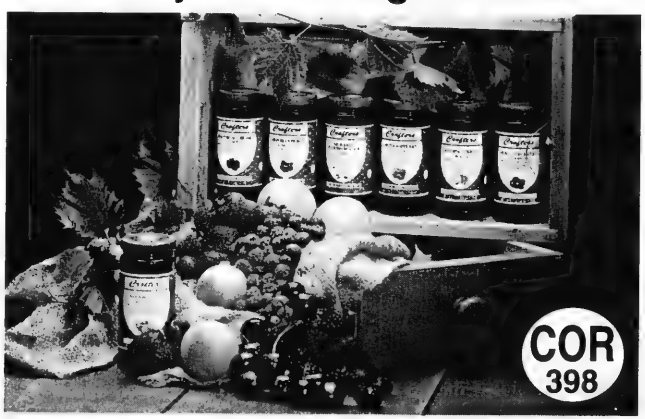
Crofters jams are organic and Kosher — an unbeatable combination!



The Crofters story starts with organic farming, free of chemical fertilizers, pesticides and herbicides. Once harvested, our fruit is carefully processed at reduced temperatures to minimize loss of flavour, colour and vitamins. All of our products have high fruit content and low sugar content, and all of our ingredients except for the natural apple pectin (0.8%) are certified organic. Nature's finest bounty, in ten delicious flavours!

Blueberry: We use certified organic wild blueberries from Quebec. Small in size but very rich in flavour, they are much tastier than cultivated blueberries.

Morello Cherry: We are especially proud of our Morello cherries, a variety grown in Europe. Unlike the widely used Montmorency cherry, which is of light colour and weak flavour, these Morellos are dark sour cherries, providing a beautiful colour and taste experience.

Apricot: Whether we use our Spanish or California pitted apricots, both origins guarantee plenty of sunshine to ensure a high, naturally occurring sugar content and lots of flavour.

Blackberry: We use certified organic wild blackberries from Chili which are small in size and very rich in flavour.

Sicilian Blood Orange: Scary name, delicious taste! Unlike typical English marmalade, we use the whole orange with its red flesh, not just the peel. The Sicilian red orange is the "Matriarch" of oranges, full of flavour, giving you a new dimension in orange marmalade.

Strawberry: We use both Chilean and Canadian strawberries. The use of Northern varieties including Hoods, Totems and Senga Senganas guarantees a superior flavour.

Raspberry: The raspberries used by Crofters are selected for their exceptional colour and flavour and are grown in Chile.

Black Currant: These tart European berries are very high in vitamin C and add some zest to your breakfast.

Red Currant: Our only jelly, made from the red variety of currants. Wonderful on its own or with nut butter.

Cane juice vs. fruit juice sweetening: fact & fiction

All our fruit spreads are sweetened with organic cane sugar (dehydrated cane juice), which, after inversion, has exactly the same molecular structure as the sugars supplied by grape juice concentrate. The non-organic grapes commonly used to sweeten jams are one of the most heavily sprayed fruits due to their tendency to mould quickly. That's why we prefer organic cane sugar. Whether your concerns are health-related or environment-related, it pays you to investigate the facts.

Better suite design improves life for the independently-minded senior

Special to the Canadian Jewish News

Wider doorways and raised power outlets are a relatively simple matter for the construction industry to incorporate into their building layouts. But for seniors, these "aging in place" features are a very big deal indeed, often allowing them to function much longer without the need for outside assistance.

What are some of these enhancements? A scan of a typical two bedroom suite now under construction at Two Neptune Drive (at Bathurst) in North Toronto is a good example of how Baycrest is rethinking building plans to better serve the senior's community. It also helps explain why over 65% of the 120 suites in this building have sold so quickly.

1 Doorways
Handy package shelf at every suite entrance and wider doors with levered handles throughout to accommodate walkers or wheelchairs.

2 All Rooms
Higher, easy-to-reach power outlets and lower, more convenient rocker-style light switches.

The Wembley from $231,500

3 Kitchen
Safe stoves with front control dials, pantry shelving with long, D-shaped handles for better accessibility.

4 Bathroom
Roomier bathroom layouts to accommodate bath chairs or a care provider, pre-blocked walls for easy installation of grab bars, pressure balanced shower controls, and semi-encasse sinks for use when seated.

5 Extra Guest Space
Hobby room or second bedroom for visiting children, grandchildren or care-givers.

6 Added Peace of Mind
Increased safety is assured by a built-in emergency notification system with on site response and non-motion detection, plus sprinklers throughout.

7 Outside of Suite
24-hour concierge, fitness centre, multi-purpose party room adjacent to landscaped courtyard, boardroom, games room, library, rooftop garden and greenhouse, and optional care services available. There's also a free shuttle bus to Baycrest and the Wagman Centre.

Alzheimer fund-raiser still a laughing matter

By ADAM BELLO
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Funny how things can sometimes come together.

In 1997, stand-up comedian Les Aaron set out to give greater exposure to Jewish stand-ups in community events.

At the same time, the Canadian Friends of Herzog Hospital was seeking to reach Toronto's then largely untapped young Jewish adult audience. The fund-raising organization for the Jerusalem hospital was looking for less-than-traditional activities in its local campaign. In Aaron, they found an ally.

The result was As Funny As It Gets, an evening of stand-up Jewish comedy. Now in its third year, the annual event returns to the Leah Posluns Theatre on May 18 at 7:30 p.m. All proceeds will be donated to the Herzog Hospital for its continuing work in Alzheimer's research.

"You could find Jewish comedians performing individually in venues such as Yuk Yuk's and Comedywood, but there was nothing in the community as a theme night that would bring these headlining acts together in one show," he says.

As funny as it gets

"Canadian Friends of Herzog Hospital was the first organization in the Jewish Community to warm up to As Funny As It Gets as a form of outreach.

"The event also has an appeal to young Jewish adults, both single and married, as a community outing other than dances and the bar scene," adds Aaron, who is the host of the evening.

In addition to Aaron, this year's roster features veteran stand-up comedians Steve Levine (Just For Laughs Comedy Festival), Jim McAleese (Evening at the Improv), Greg Eckler (Open Mike with Mike Bullard) and Tim Rykert (Comics!).

In its short mirth-making history, the event has yielded some serious returns. Last year's near sell-out raised more than $3,000 for the hospital's research. Jan Babins, executive director of the Toronto branch, says the current response has given rise to even higher expectations.

"This event continues to help us grow for the future, both in fund-raising and in community development," she says.

"The Toronto office is growing, and we need to heighten the involvement of young people to help champion this cause, to ensure a strong Canadian presence with the hospital's mandate."

Turning to Herzog Hospital's efforts with Alzheimer's disease, Babins says its work in research and rehabilitation has previously been done in conjunction with other international efforts, including Canadian institutions. Major collaborations involved the University of Toronto, Mount Sinai Hospital and McGill University in Montreal.

Crown Heights, Brooklyn

Touring the chassidic neighbourhood

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

BROOKLYN – "Lubavitch started giving tours of Brooklyn, because there's a lot of misinformation out there about the chassidic community," says Rabbi Beryl Epstein, our tour guide.

On this day, he is leading a bus load of visitors leaving midtown Manhattan for 770 Eastern Parkway, headquarters of the Lubavitch chassidic movement in the Crown Heights section of Brooklyn.

During the 45-minute trek to Brooklyn, Rabbi Epstein, a native of Chattanooga, Tenn., describes the two-century-old chassidic movement, its charismatic founder, the Baal Shem Tov, and the present Lubavitch sect, which has some 250,000 followers worldwide.

Lubavitch is one of more than 200 chassidic movements still operative today, remnants of a devastated European Jewish community that was once at least 60 percent chassidic.

A cluster of 10,000 to 15,000 Lubavitchers live in Crown Heights, a burgeoning community in which children outnumber adults by two to one. The neighbourhood is already crowded to capacity: the demand for living space is so high, and local vacancy rates so low, that competing ethnic groups have a tug-of-war over each newly available house and apartment.

Rabbi Epstein discusses the seventh Lubavitcher Rebbe, Menachem Mendel Schneerson, who died without a successor in 1994, but he expertly dodges the controversial question of whether he is the Messiah, as many Lubavitchers believe.

"Let's leave that until later," he suggests. A wise and congenial host, he's conducted this tour for 15 years, and he knows where the potholes lie. He also knows the locations of famous synagogues, delicatessens and other Jewish landmarks, which he points out as we cross the Lower East Side.

Soon after we cross the Brooklyn Bridge, we reach 770 Eastern Parkway, a large elegant brownstone in which the Rebbe had his office. Once, the Jewish multitudes would line up outside to receive his blessings; he also gave out dollar bills, which the recipients understood they were to supplement with dollars of their own and give to charity.

We enter the vestibule. Rabbi Epstein says Rabbi Schneerson called 770 Eastern Parkway "the Beit Hamigdash of the Exile," because he saw it as the most holy building for the Jewish people anywhere, at least until the rebuilding of the Temple.

He talks about Rabbi Schneerson's great powers of prophecy – relating, for instance, that he correctly predicted when and how the Gulf War of 1991 would end.

"Who is the rebbe now?" someone asks.

"That's an excellent question," Rabbi Epstein replies. "I'll save that question for later."

A large building next door is the organizational home of the Lubavitch movement and the nexus of its vast outreach network. Some 2,500 Lubavitch representatives bring Torah, charity and Yiddishkeit to many outposts around the globe.

Inside is a large prayer sanctuary. From the visitors' gallery, we look down and see about 100 worshippers arranged in several groups; new services begin whenever a necessary quorum of 10 men is reached.

A banner on the wall proclaims Rabbi Schneerson as the Messiah in big Hebrew letters, but fortunately for Rabbi Epstein, nobody requests a translation.

Around the corner is a remarkable library featuring display cases that hold a yarmulke of the revered First ("Alter") Rebbe, Schneur Zalman of Liadi, and many documents in his handwriting. Also under glass are several extremely rare handwritten copies of the Alter Rebbe's holy mystical tome, the Tanya. The library also holds the world's largest collection of Haggadot.

Collection of Haggadot

The tour concludes with a kosher lunch at a local deli. Understandably, we do not visit the Rebbe's grave site some 15 kilometres away in Queens. The site has become a shrine for the faithful; it is not for tourists.

During the return trip to Manhattan, our host answers more questions, including one about the Satmar of Williamsburg. Briefly, he talks about these Chassidim, who are as introverted as the Lubavitch are extroverted. The Satmar do not recognize the Jewish State of Israel.

Why, someone else asks, does Rabbi Epstein always refer to the late Rabbi Schneerson in the present tense? "We talk about all great Jewish leaders that way, including Moshe Rabbeinu," he explains. "It's because they are still living for us."

The Hassidic Bus & Walking Tour costs $36 (US), including lunch, and leaves Sundays from the New York Public Library and other spots in Manhattan. Departure is at 9:30 a.m. and the return time is 1:30 p.m. Weekday tours are also available. Reservations are highly recommended. 800-838-8687; www.jewishtours.com; or e-mail JewishTours@Juno.com.

ALBERTA DRAMA TEACHER WINS PLAYWRITING CONTEST

University of Alberta drama instructor Vern Thiessen has won first prize in the 1999 Canadian Jewish Playwriting Contest for Einstein's Gift, a dramatic look at the life of the Nobel Prize-winning chemist and Nazi victim, Fritz Haber.

The prize is sponsored by the Jewish Theatre Committee of Toronto and the Bloor JCC. Thiessen, the first non-Jew to win the award, saw the dramatic possibilities in Haber's story after reading a review of a recently published biography of Haber.

Seeing that his opportunities would be limited by his Jewishness, Haber converted to Christianity. A prodigiously talented chemist, he won many professional awards and was even given his own research institute by the German government. Eventually, Hitler's anti-Jewish decrees forced him to make some wrenching choices.

"I was fascinated by the moral and religious dilemmas that Haber confronted," Thiessen says, "mostly unanticipated and with incalculable consequences."

A longtime drama instructor at the University of Alberta, Thiessen was born to Prairie Mennonite stock and grew up, he says, in the shadow of religious prejudice and discrimination, which gave him insight into Haber's dilemma.

Vern Thiessen

His research took him to the Haber Institute archives, where he gained access to the newly deposited letters exchanged by Haber and Albert Einstein. It is this relationship that forms the leitmotif of the play.

The play premieres in two staged readings directed by Corinne Copnick. Bloor JCC, 750 Spadina Ave. at Bloor. May 28, 2 and 8 p.m. Members free; non-members $10. 416-924-6211.

WTN serves up delicious serving of Loving Spoonfuls

By JOYCE SINGER-D'APRILE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Allan Novak has discovered the secret recipe for a successful television show and it's bubbie-licious!

Combine several Canadian grandmothers of various backgrounds, including Jewish, Italian, Japanese, Cree and Armenian, and add to the mix one charming, hilarious host. Feature a different bubbie every week – they range in age from their 60s to their 90s. Showcase them in their own kitchens, where they recount their life stories and whip up their favourite recipes. Then name the show Loving Spoonfuls and sell it to the Women's Television Network. Presto! Sweet success.

"Whatever I do, it's got to be funny, and it's got to have some edge. The fact that it's cooking, the fact that it's grandmothers, I call this a docu-comedy. Everything I do gravitates towards the comedic," Novak says.

Our grandmothers are a treasure trove of time-honoured recipes passed down through the generations, he says of the stories they tell flavoured with heavy dollops of bittersweet humour.

This whimsical cooking show was inspired, Novak says, by the kitchen banter between him and his Auntie Ruth, who is a grandmother.

"I was looking around and thinking about my next project, and everyone seemed to be going crazy for cooking shows. So I thought, 'OK, I'll do a cooking show.' Then I was sitting around the kitchen one day with my Auntie Ruthie, who was cooking perogies, and I was thinking, 'It doesn't get any better than this!' "

"My nephew Allan seems to love my cooking," says Ruth Zimmer, 72, "And that's how it started. Nothing was rehearsed! I was an amateur stage-actress. I'd done a lot of plays. So I wasn't camera-shy. It really came naturally. We went to the kosher butcher, as my house is kosher. Then we came home and we worked.

"It's about 10 hours of hard work, for about 20 minutes on the show. But David is a wonderful host, he's a sweetheart. It really makes it easy when you have someone like that."

Ruth hails from Poland, and chicken soup with knaidlach, is a sure bet as one item on the menu.

The Jewish connection is quite extensive in Loving Spoonfuls, because Novak enlisted his pals – David Gale, the zany, irrepressible host; director Gail Singer, famous for her award-winning documentaries; and Bob Wiseman, formerly of Blue Rodeo, who composed original music for the series. (Fun fact: These Torontonians are all former Winnipeggers.)

Gale has been buddies with Novak as far back as Talmud Torah elementary school in Winnipeg. "We're always looking for a project we can do together", Gale says. "When he came up with this marvelous idea for Loving Spoonfuls, and since I've done a lot of hosting and I love women and I especially love grandmothers…we really felt we had this teamwork going. It's perfect!"

"This was one of my most pleasurable working experiences," Singer says. "It's such a good idea and everyone enjoyed themselves so much. It's so unusual for things to go so smoothly, to turn out so well, to have so much fun – and it's all about food!

"One of the shows I directed was with Pearl Geneen, 84, who is a very sophisticated bubbie and a very sophisticated cook. She used to own a shop called the Complete Kitchen. Unlike the other bubbies, who are mostly home cooks, she had cooked professionally."

Pearl Geneen says, "My mother was an Irish Jew although I was brought up in Scotland. In Toronto, I started a cooking school in the '60s, then I opened my shop in the '70s. I sold it, but it still exists today, in Yorkville."

Geneen has had other interesting professional adventures. "I've done a commercial for Sprint. I did a video for some singing group. I don't know who…they were, but I was in the background."

On Loving Spoonfuls, "I did a trendy, up-to-date version of a sweet and sour salmon. It's a Jewish-Scottish dish."

Each cook prepared several different dishes at the taping, but only some recipes made it to the final cut. Geneen appeared on the show May 8. Ruth Zimmer appears May 29. The show runs Mondays, 6:30 p.m. on WTN, with frequent repeats throughout the week.

Hot Docs Film Festival

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Hot Docs, the Canadian International Documentary Film Festival, took place in Toronto last week. Several of the films were of specifically Jewish interest. Following are capsule reviews of three of them.

A decade after her father's death, New York filmmaker Pola Rapaport was rifling through his desk. She found a pocket-size black-and-white photograph of a boy who resembled her dad, Ionel, a Romanian Jew who had settled in the United States in 1954.

From the moment she laid eyes on that photo, she was convinced that he, Pierre Radulescu-Banu, must be her brother. She was almost right.

Years later, Rapaport's mother, Marjorie, received a letter from Bucharest which began: "I am looking for the trace of Doctor Ionel Rapaport's family." It was signed Pierre Radulescu-Banu.

The letter opened a Pandora's box of emotions and was the genesis of Rapaport's affecting film, Family Secret.

In fact, there is more than one secret in the movie, shot on location in the United States, Romania and France.

Ionel Rapaport, a psychiatrist who died in 1972 at 63, was a secretive person. He never disclosed he had a son out of wedlock in France with a Romanian woman, a medical doctor who raised Pierre, Rapaport's half-brother.

Pierre, in turn, did not learn he was Jewish until he was 18.

Family Secret, which is not as convoluted as it may sound, is a touching drama which encompasses such 20th century themes as dislocation, resettlement, war, persecution, anti-Semitism and East-West ideological struggles.

Rapaport draws a nuanced picture of Ionel, a complex man who left Romania in 1926, studied medicine in France, survived the German occupation in the French resistance movement, and immigrated to the United States after meeting Marjorie, an artist, in Paris.

Chatzkel Lemchen, 93, has witnessed it all: the 1917 Bolshevik revolution, two world wars, the Kovno ghetto, the Dachau concentration camp, and Lithuania's startling transition from vassal state to independent nation.

A linguist and a lexicographer in Vilnius (Vilna), Lemchen is a celebrated figure in contemporary Lithuania who has received his country's highest awards. But he is a lonely soul, being the last one in his family to remain in Lithuania.

Uncle Chatzkel, written and directed by Lemchen's grand nephew, the Australian filmmaker Rod Freedman, is an affectionate portrait of Lemchen from his boyhood in the shtetl of Papile to his present status as an esteemed academic and intellectual.

During World War I, Lemchen, his six siblings and their parents fled to Russia. Seven years later, they returned to their home, only to find it in ruins. Lemchen became an assistant to Janos Jablonkas, widely regarded as the father of the modern Lithuanian language.

During World War II, Lemchen's two sons were taken away by the Germans, never to be seen again. Eventually, he was reunited with his wife, Ela, who died in 1979.

Uncle Chatzkel, clearly a labour of love, raises pertinent questions about the nature of identity and the quest for family roots.

Gary Ogin's British short, The Worst Jewish Football Team in the World, basks in a time-honoured maxim. It doesn't matter whether you win or lose, but how you play the game.

The subject of Ogin's whimsical film is a winless soccer team, composed of fervently Orthodox boys, whose spirit never flags. The players, all of whom are 11-years old, are no match for any of their opponents. But they like the sport and what they lack in ability they make up in enthusiasm.

"We enjoy ourselves," says a player. "The result doesn't really count."

A practical philosophy, to say the least.

Jews are once again pawns in Iran's game

By MICHAEL J. JORDAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

The case of 13 Iranian Jews accused of spying apparently began as a power struggle in Iran's Jewish community.

But it wasn't long before the dispute was sucked into the greater drama that has convulsed Iran during the past few years – the pitched battle for supremacy between Iranian hard-liners and their reformist rivals.

And if history serves as a guide, presumably this won't be the last time Iran's 2,700-year-old Jewish community will be a pawn in the country's political struggles.

Since the Islamic Revolution of 1979 – even as Iranian Jewry has shrivelled from 100,000 to some 25,000 – 17 Jews have been condemned to death, primarily for being accused spies, according to Jewish groups in the United States. Two Jews were executed in Tehran three years ago.

The next one sentenced to death could be Hamid "Dani" Tefileen.

After facing the Revolutionary Court, Tefileen, 29, was seen on Iranian state television confessing to having been trained in Israel by the Mossad, the foreign intelligence agency of the Jewish state.

But American Jewish observers, human rights groups and foreign diplomats denounced the hearings that began last week as a political show trial. They assumed Tefileen, who said he had visited Israel, was coerced to confess.

For 16 months, he had been in solitary confinement, with human contact limited mostly to his interrogators.

It is unclear whether Tefileen will be the fall guy or if his confession is a harbinger for the entire group. A conviction could bring anything from six months in prison to a death sentence.

Tefileen, a clerk in his father's shoe shop, is said to be a devoutly religious man, as are all the accused.

And that, in part, may have been what landed them in this predicament.

The steady emigration of Iranian Jews since 1979 has left a vacuum in leadership, as many top religious and community figures were among those who headed to Israel and the United States.

The Jewish leadership was traditionally based in Tehran, the capital. Jews have been more or less allowed to maintain a communal life, as long as it was low key and it was not seen as a threat to the Islamic state.

Appeasing the authorities ensured a modicum of security, said Sam Kermanian, secretary general of the Los Angeles-based American Iranian Jewish Federation.

However, recent years have seen Jews in the southern city of Shiraz – a bastion of religious conservatism in general – grow more committed and energetic in their religious life, Kermanian said.

Most Iranian Jews are Orthodox, but the Shiraz community appeared to be growing more fervent in its practices, which many young Jews in the region found appealing.

Because of that growing appeal, the Shiraz Jews soon became a source of irritation to the Iranian authorities, who presumably preferred dealing with the leadership in Tehran.

The Shiraz Jews allegedly ignored warnings from both government officials and Jewish leaders in Tehran to tone down and limit their activities, Kermanian said.

The arrests in January and March 1999 of 13 Jews – most of whom are from Shiraz – may have been meant to send a message.

"The Iranians implicitly mentioned that the arrests were related to the warnings," said Kermanian. "They needed to make it clear to the people that they were serious – basically to punish them and scare them off – and that they were going to be released shortly."

Other observers, however, suggest that the hard-liners, who are working to maintain a grip on power in the wake of political victories by reformists, had already fingered the Jews as the engine to whip up Islamic fervour and undermine the liberalizing efforts of moderates like Iranian President Mohammad Khatami.

Jews are second only to Iran's Baha'i minority as favourite targets of the authorities to rally the public against a common enemy, according to observers.

The intracommunal dispute "played some role at the beginning, but we shouldn't exaggerate it or exonerate the Iranian authorities for pinning this on the Jews," said Malcolm Hoenlein, executive vice-chair of the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations.

Once the arrests became public, the situation was apparently exacerbated, say observers, with Iranian hard-liners becoming more adamant about punishing the "Iran 13."

The situation prompted debates among advocates about whether public or private diplomacy would be more effective in securing their release.

"We gave the Iranians many opportunities to negotiate and it all came to naught," said Hoenlein, who has been at the forefront of negotiations on the detainees' behalf, working through his network of contacts in Iran, Europe and America.

Before launching the campaign to secure their release, Hoenlein said his organization conducted its own investigation into the spying charges. Consultations with officials from the CIA, the FBI and the Mossad confirmed that the allegations had been fabricated, he said.

The Muslim fundamentalists who control Iran's judiciary are out to sabotage the small steps taken by their reformist rivals to repair relations with the West, say U.S. observers. At this point, anything less than convictions of some or all of the "Zionist spies" would mean losing face among their followers.

In such an atmosphere, some wonder why any Iranian Jew remains wedded to the land. Some suggest that everyone who remains has at least one or two relatives in the United States. However, while those who left generally had the financial means to do so, those who remain are said to be either too poor, too old, too complacent – or simply too stubborn to sever a long tradition.

Student games aim at friendship, understanding

By SIMONE JOSEPH
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Imagine being part of a team of athletes who hail from the Middle East, Europe, and North America – yet none of your teammates are from the same country.

Hundreds of high school students will experience just that scenario at the Middle East/Mediterranean Scholar-Athlete Games in Tel Aviv this summer.

"The objective is to foster understanding and friendships," said Wally Halas, commissioner of the Middle East/Mediterranean Scholar-Athlete Games.

There will be no national teams, making it conceivable that 10 players on a basketball court could be from 10 different countries.

The event is organized by the Institute For International Sport, a Rhode Island-based organization that promotes good sportsmanship and improved relations among nations.

The institute introduced the World Scholar-Athlete Games in 1993 and since then has organized scholar-athlete games for Ireland, Australia/Pacific Rim and the United States.

Participants of the Middle East games must be scholastic achievers and either super athletes or excellent artists.

"Excellent students who also excel in extra curricular activities tend to be leaders when they become adults," Halas said.

The institute hopes that if it can foster solid relationships among young leaders, there may be a pay off in the future. Leaders of two countries who were on the same team or who competed against each other are less likely to go to war and are more likely to co-operate on mutually beneficial ventures, he said

Halas cited the example of a girl from Burundi, East Africa who played with a doubles tennis partner from Japan at the 1993 World Scholar-Athlete Games. If the Burundi native becomes minister of agriculture and the Japanese girl becomes head of a bank, the minister may remember her old doubles partner and phone the Japanese bank president to ask for help in financing agriculture projects, Halas suggested.

Another aim is to integrate artists with athletes.

"In the United States, there has always been a mythical barrier where 'jocks' don't like theatre kids," Halas said.

During theme days, the 400 to 500 participants will meet in small groups to discuss issues of international importance, such as peace in the Middle East, ethics and sportsmanship. Experts on each topic will also deliver keynote addresses.

Halas believes that by spending time with each other, the athletes and arts students will develop mutual respect.

"Both sides will find out, 'wow, these kids are pretty talented in what they do'," he said.

The sports competitions will include basketball, beach volleyball, chess, soccer, swimming, tennis, track and field and volleyball tournaments. Arts competitions will include writing, poetry, theatre, dance, symphony, art, cinema and TV.

The games will be held from June 24 to July 3 at Tel Aviv University and the Wingate Institute for Physical Education and Sport.

The event is open to Canadians 15 to 20 years old. Up to 20 spots are reserved for Canadians, said Candice Elliott, director of enrollment for the games.

Maccabi Canada gearing up for Israel

TORONTO — The 16th Maccabiah Games are fast approaching and Maccabi Canada is getting ready to go for the gold.

Recruitment for the Canadian team is well under way, with trials for most of the spots set to kick into high gear this summer.

"Canada will be sending a contingent of 350 or more to the Games," said Allen Gerskup, national athletic chair and head of Maccabi Canada's selection committee. "We are in the process of building the biggest and best team ever. We have selected the majority of our coaches, managers, medical staff and chaperones. Applications for athletes who are interested in representing Canada at the Games are now available. We intend to select our teams earlier than ever and trials are set to take place during this summer."

The 16th Maccabiah Games is scheduled to run from July 16 to 26, 2001 in Israel. More than 5,500 athletes from over 50 countries are expected to participate in the first Games of the new millennium.

Open competition is invited for the following sports: hockey, badminton, basketball, beach volleyball, fencing, golf, gymnastics, judo, karate, lawn bowling, rowing, sailing, squash, swimming, tae kwon do, tennis, ten pin bowling, track and field, triathlon, archery, body building, bridge, mini football, half marathon, rhythmic gymnastics, rugby, table tennis, water polo and wrestling.

Canadian juniors, born in 1985, '86 or '87, are invited to compete in baseball, basketball, soccer, gymnastics, rhythmic gymnastics, squash, swimming, tennis, track and field and volleyball.

Canadian Masters competition – age categories vary from sport to sport – are expected to include golf, squash and tennis.

Disabled athletes will be able to compete in tennis and swimming.

Each sport's inclusion is conditional on the participation of four countries.

In chronological order, the following trial dates have been confirmed for the coming months. Not all venues are yet known.

- May 18-22: Montreal regional open trials in outdoor soccer;
- May 26-28: Toronto regional open trials in outdoor soccer;
- May 30 (and June 4): Montreal regional trials in junior soccer;
- June 3-4: Western Canada regional trials in junior boys basketball (to be held in Calgary);
- June 7-8: Central Canada regional trials in junior boys basketball (in Toronto);
- June 10-11: Eastern Canada regional trials in junior boys basketball (in Montreal);
- June 15: entry deadline for golf;
- June 18: (tentatively): Toronto regional trials for junior soccer;
- June 25: national trials (in Montreal) in junior soccer;
- Aug. 3-7: national trials (in Montreal) in open outdoor soccer;
- Aug. 5-7: men's and women's open tennis trials in Toronto (at Valleywood Tennis Club);
- August 26: national trials in tae kwon-do in Toronto (at SkyDome);
- Sept. 8-10: men's and women's golf trials in Toronto;
- October (date to be confirmed): national trials in 10-pin bowling in Toronto.

מעבר לאופק: לזכרה של אמי

12 sheets filo dough
1/2 cup melted butter
8-11 apples, peeled, cut in 1/4's
1/2 cup white sugar juice of half a lemon
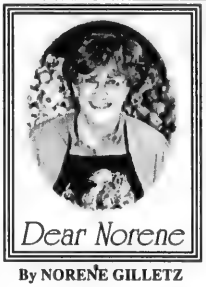
1 tsp. cinnamon
3 tblsp. bread crumbs
icing sugar

Brush 9" pie pan with melted butter. Lay in 1 sheet of filo, press into pan allowing sides to hang over. Brush with butter. Repeat with 4 sheets of filo. Sprinkle with half the bread crumbs.
Toss apples with sugar, lemon, cinnamon and remaining crumbs. Spoon apples into pan pressing firmly. Fold in overlapped ends of filo. Brush 1 filo leaf with melted butter (buttered side up) and place on top of apples; repeat. Cut remaining leaves into 9" circles, brushing each with butter. Place these filo leaves on top of apples. Score pastry through to apples to allow steam to escape.
Bake 40-50 minutes at 350°F. Cool. Sift lightly with icing sugar.

About Food



By NORENE GILLETZ

Mother's Day is Sunday, May 14. Why not treat Mom to breakfast in bed, or maybe a family brunch with the whole mishpachah?

Here are some simple suggestions for brunch or lunch. To minimize clean-up, use paper plates, cups, disposable cutlery and napkins. Buy fresh flowers and don't forget those Mother's Day cards! If you're culinarily challenged, don't panic. Keep it simple and enjoy the celebration.

Fill a bread basket with muffins, rolls and bagels. Serve lox, cream cheese, sliced tomatoes and onions. Other ideas include smoked whitefish, carp, pickled salmon, herring, chopped egg, salmon and tuna, party sandwiches, or a cheese tray garnished with grapes. If you're short on time, buy ready-made spreads (i.e., hummus, tzatziki, eggplant, babaganoush, tofu spread). Serve a vegetable and/or grain-based salad, or veggies and dip. Quiches, kugels, blintzes and vegetarian lasagna are reliable standbys.

Some suggestions to sweeten up the day include a fresh fruit platter, assorted squares, brownies, cookies and a Mother's Day cake with ice cream or frozen yogurt. Don't forget coffee, tea, orange juice – perhaps even a splash of champagne!

BAKED CHALLAH PUFF

12 slices challah
2 cups grated low-fat cheese (cheddar or Swiss)
1/2 cup grated Parmesan cheese
3 tomatoes, cored and cut up (optional)
4 eggs (or 2 eggs plus 4 whites)
3 1/2 cups milk (skim or 1 percent)
1 tsp. salt
Freshly ground pepper
1/4 tsp. each dried basil and oregano

Cut challah into 1-in. pieces. Layer half in a sprayed 13x9-in. casserole. Add half of cheese and tomatoes. Repeat once more. Blend eggs, milk and seasonings. Pour evenly over bread-cheese mixture. Cover with foil; refrigerate at least 1 hour or preferably overnight.

Remove casserole from refrigerator. Preheat oven to 350. Bake covered for 30 minutes. Uncover and bake 30 minutes longer, until puffed and golden. Serve immediately. Yield: 12 servings. Do not freeze.

Tuna Cheese Variation: Place half of challah, cheese and tomatoes in casserole. Top with 4 chopped green onions and two 6 1/2-oz. cans drained tuna. Add remaining challah, cheese and tomatoes; pour egg-milk mixture over. Continue as directed.

Who 'owns' use of menorah?

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — In a small room in the Federal Court of Canada's Toronto regional office, lawyers have begun a battle over one of the most recognizable and potent symbols of the Jewish people.

At centre stage is the seven-branched menorah, first constructed as a golden candelabrum and used in the Tabernacle during the 40 years in the wilderness, according to God's instructions. A menorah was kept in the inner sanctum of both the First and Second Temples, and kindled each night by kohanim. Shapes and sizes may vary, but the menorah remains a paramount theological symbol of the people of Israel and its mission, according to the Book of Isaiah, to be a light unto the nations.

The menorah is also Israel's official state emblem, appearing on coins, banknotes and all government correspondence.

Missionaries want symbol as protected logo

Later this year, the Federal Court will hear a custody battle over the emblem.

More accurately, it will be the court's task to decide whether the menorah – even a stylized, modern-looking one – can be used as a protected symbol of a group whose members call themselves Jews but who worship Jesus as the messiah.

Chosen People Ministries, a Jews for Jesus-type organization whose adherents number barely 100 in Toronto and Montreal, says it is merely trying to formalize a logo it has been using for years on its stationery, books, brochures and even baseball caps.

But this is a case, it argues, that goes beyond symbols, extending into legally guaranteed freedoms of religion and expression.

Indeed, the battle is likely to spill over into heated discussions of theology, of why – and whether – accepting Jesus as messiah disqualifies one from being Jewish.

On the other side is Canadian Jewish Congress. It alleges that Chosen People Ministries' stock-in-trade is deception and the aggressive proselytizing of Jews. CJC contends it and other so-called Hebrew-Christian groups routinely appropriate Jewish symbols and customs to intentionally blur the line between Judaism and Christianity. Allowing Chosen People Ministries to use a menorah as its logo, CJC claims, would sow confusion among Jews and gentiles alike, not to mention cheapen the symbol's significance.

"The menorah is a universal Jewish symbol, akin to the cross being a universal Christian symbol," asserts Manuel Prutschi, CJC's national director of community relations. "Have you ever seen a cross used by anything other than a Christian group?"

Larry Rich, the Toronto-based Canadian director of Chosen People Ministries, sees it this way: "The real issue here is whether a Jewish person can believe that Jesus is the messiah. Our having the logo is routine. Far more significant is our freedom to practise our beliefs."

The News in Brief

CANADA

Stabbing Incident

TORONTO — Toronto Police are seeking witnesses to a recent stabbing in an area of the city heavily populated by Russian-Jewish émigrés. On the evening of May 7, a 22-year-old male was attacked from behind while walking on Rockford Road near Torresdale Avenue. He was taken to Sunnybrook Hospital where he was treated for his wounds, none of which were life threatening. The suspect is described as a white male, 18 to 22, with a medium build. The stabbing was the third attack in 18 days within the same few blocks. The first incident occurred in the Torresdale and Fisherville area and the second near Torresdale and Robingrove Road. All three took place between 9:00 p.m. and 9:30 p.m.

Anyone with information is asked to call police at 416-808-3204 or Crimestoppers at 222-TIPS (416-222-8477).

ISRAEL

Survey Says...

JERUSALEM — A majority of Israelis say they are dissatisfied with Prime Minister Ehud Barak's performance, according to a Gallup poll published in the Israeli daily Ma'ariv. Only 39 percent of those polled said they would vote for Barak if elections were held now.

Sri Lankan Ties

JERUSALEM — Israel and Sri Lanka have resumed diplomatic ties. The South Asian country, which broke off relations with Israel in 1970, is expected to send a delegation to Israel in the coming days.

WORLD

Survivors Cleared

BERLIN — Two Holocaust survivors who in 1946 tried to poison thousands of Nazi officials in an Allied prison camp can no longer be prosecuted for attempted murder, a German court has ruled. The two survivors, now living in Israel, confessed recently to putting arsenic in bread supplies for the Nuremberg-Langwasser camp in southern Germany, where some 12,000 Nazis were held. Some 200 inmates were hospitalized, but not enough poison was used to kill anyone. Although attempted murder is not covered by a statute of limitations in Germany, the court made an exception "because of persecution experienced" by the two during the Holocaust.

British Accounts

LONDON — Jewish leaders have praised a plan by British banks to enable Holocaust survivors and heirs of its victims to claim funds that were frozen during World War II. Earlier this week, the British Bankers' Association published the names on 10,800 dormant bank accounts holding a total of some $3.5 million (US).

Polish PM Apologizes

WARSAW — Polish Prime Minister Jerzy Buzek last week apologized for anti-Semitic incidents witnessed by thousands of Jewish youths on the March of the Living. The inscription "Jews to the Crematorium" appeared in Lublin, a city close to the nearby former death camp of Majdanek. The incident occurred a day after the presidents of Israel and Poland led thousands of Jews and Poles in the annual march commemorating the Holocaust. More than 400 youths from Canada are on the march.

Irving Told: Pay Up

LONDON — Holocaust denier David Irving has come a step closer to financial ruin since a British judge ordered him to start paying off millions of dollars in legal costs. The judge ordered Irving to make a down payment of some $250,000 to Penguin Books by June 16 following his failed libel action against the publisher and American historian Deborah Lipstadt.

Mikvah Unearthed

RIO DE JANEIRO — Archeologists have discovered an ancient mikvah in northeastern Brazil. The mikvah was hidden under Kahal Zur Israel, which is believed to be the oldest synagogue in the Americas. The temple fell into disuse after Jews were expelled from the area in 1654.

O'Connor Mourned

NEW YORK — Jewish leaders have expressed condolences following the death of New York's longtime Catholic archbishop. John Cardinal O'Connor died May 3 at the age of 80 after battling brain cancer.

Team Makes Progress On Vatican Papers

LONDON — A team of Jewish and Catholic scholars says it has made "substantial progress" in examining published Vatican documents relating to the Holocaust.

The team, which includes University of Toronto Holocaust historian Prof. Michael Marrus, also renewed a call for the Vatican to open its unpublished wartime archives to outside researchers.

"We remain committed to full openness in the examination of the archival record," the International Catholic-Jewish Historical Commission said last week in a statement issued following its four-day meeting in London.

The commission, which has met once before, includes three Jewish and three Catholic scholars and was jointly established last fall by the Vatican and the International Jewish Committee for Interreligious Consultations.

Its mandate was to review the 11 volumes of World War II archives published by the Vatican between 1965 and 1981, in order to clarify the role of the Roman Catholic Church and of the wartime pope, Pius XII, during the Holocaust.

Deschenes Dies

MONTREAL — Jules Deschenes, the Quebec jurist who authored a landmark report on Nazi war criminals in Canada, died last week at the age of 76. His 1986 report that listed more than 200 war crimes suspects and 20 cases requiring urgent action prompted legislation that allowed Canadian courts to try suspects. Deschenes served as a Quebec Court of Appeal judge from 1972-73 and as chief justice of the Quebec Superior Court.

Community response urged on affordable housing

16% of Toronto's Jewish children live in poverty

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The concept of Jewish communal responsibility must be extended beyond the Jewish community to everyone in the community in which we live, said a local Orthodox rabbi at a recent one-day conference on affordable housing.

Judaism has a "mandatory good Samaritan law," said Rabbi Moshe Shulman, spiritual leader of Toronto's Shaarei Shomayim Congregation. "It's not enough to say, 'It's not my problem.'"

The rabbi was speaking last week at a day-long conference on affordable housing aimed at housing professionals and Jewish agencies involved in housing-related issues.

Anne Golden

Rabbi Moshe Shulman

The event was hosted by the Kehilla Residential Program, at North York Memorial Hall.

Stephanie Olin-Chapman, executive director of Kehilla (the housing arm of UJA FEDERATION of Greater Toronto), outlined the extent of the problem in both the Jewish and general communities of Toronto.

Thirty-five percent of Toronto's children live in poverty, she said. According to 1996 data, she added, 16 percent (3,615) of Toronto's 22,600 Jewish children under age 18 lived in poverty.

Among the points Olin-Chapman made:

- One in four renter households are a single paycheque or illness away from homelessness.
- Over 29 percent of Jewish seniors live below the poverty line
- Of the 430 households in Jewish Family & Child Service's caseload with issues of domestic violence, 75 percent remain at risk due to lack of alternative housing arrangements.
- Over 57,000 households are on waiting lists for subsidized housing in Toronto. Waiting lists for Jewish community buildings number over 3,000.
- The challenges of maintaining a Jewish lifestyle are sometimes greater for the middle class who are less likely to qualify for or apply for subsidies for schools or camps.

Two significant issues

From the editor's desk

Across my desk each week, I receive many articles, journals, submissions, newspaper clippings, letters and essays.

The opportunity to share some of that material with readers is one of the many wonderful aspects of being editor of The CJN.

Two items caught my attention on the weekend. Each raises significant issues. I bring them to our readers' attention.

The trial in Shiraz of the 13 Iranian Jews is deeply troubling. It is a trial unlike any that we know in the west, conducted under a cloak of secrecy, behind closed doors and away from the watchful eye of independent observers.

Many apologists for the regime in Tehran and for the Revolutionary Court, under whose strict Islamic procedures the trial is being conducted, condemn westerners who criticize the judicial "process" unfolding there.

They accuse critics of the trial of demonstrating typically condescending, western, colonialist bias toward a third world country. Simply because their trial process is different, the apologists charge, does not make it unjust, and certainly not inferior to western justice.

A letter published in the Sunday New York Times (May 14) from Lawrence Kuznick provides a poignant commentary on the trial:

"Your…news article… stated that one of the defendants made a full confession outside the courtroom, saying, 'I admit to spying on behalf of the Zionist regime.'

"I, as a Jew, have never heard another Jew refer to Israel or its government as 'the Zionist regime.'"

"If this matter were not so serious, with extremely dire consequences awaiting these unfortunate men, the whole affair would be laughable. It is not. But it is an insult to everybody's intelligence."

We of the west need feel no compunction or restraint in demanding fairness for our fellow Jews suffering from the grotesque, politically motivated, state-sanctioned brutality in Iran.

We must not let Tehran think that we are being fooled by the charade they attempt to pass off to the world as justice, or that our watchfulness is slipping or that we weary of calling attention to their persecutions.

As readers know, I generally avoid commenting on editorials in other newspapers or journals. But an editorial in Sunday's Toronto Star (May 14) caught my eye.

It warrants comment, but not for the substance of the opinion it expressed. The editorialist essentially expressed pleasure that the date, May 13, established by the Israelis and the Palestinians as a target for a completed framework agreement had come and gone without incident.

Rather, it was a specific, seemingly innocuous, but so very significant, reference that deserves our attention.

"The signals coming out of Jerusalem/Al Quds in recent days have been encouraging." (My emphasis)

I do not recall another instance of a mainstream newspaper coupling, in this manner, the name Jerusalem with the Arabic name for it, Al Quds.

We have all seen the use of the name Al Quds in the context of inter-Arab relations, of Arabs speaking in their own language to other Arabs about Jerusalem, or in the context of intra-Palestinian politics regarding Jerusalem.

Indeed, there is certainly nothing inappropriate about that.

But the use of Al Quds by the Toronto Star editorialist was a departure from generally followed canons of newspaper writing style. Nor do I believe it was an unintentional departure.

Rather, the reference was undoubtedly laden with symbolic and ideological intention.

Jerusalem is the long-accepted, long-established western reference to the city. Inasmuch as it is English terminology and not Hebrew, it is a neutral nomenclature for the city.

The use of Al Quds however, is decidedly not neutral.

Al Quds is the identity for the city in Arabic just as Yerushalayim is the identity for the city in Hebrew.

Defenders of the reference will undoubtedly say there is nothing wrong with the use of Al Quds, for after all, it is the name used by the Arabs for the city. That the writer did not also use the Hebrew name, Yerushalayim, would be seen by the defenders as mere nitpicking because, in any event, the city – in which a great many Jews live – is known by everyone as Jerusalem.

But the issue with the editorial is not that it attempts to do something wrong, but rather that it attempts to do something sneaky and devious.

By using the Arabic term for the city, the editorial writer is affirming the Arabic identity of the city alongside its "other" identity. And by affirming the Arabic identity of the city, the editorial is tying that identity to the Arabic claim for sovereignty over the eastern part of the city.

The reference to Jerusalem/Al Quds in the editorial makes it very plain for all to see and read, where the Toronto Star stands on the issue of the future status of Jerusalem.

Ont. bill would set up college for Jewish women

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — If passed in its current form, an Ontario bill will create a degree-granting college exclusively for Jewish women.

Bill Pr16, which calls for the creation of Talpiot College in Toronto, passed first reading in the legislature recently, and was approved in committee hearings.

The bill's sponsor, Liberal MPP Mike Colle, who represents the heavily Orthodox riding of Eglinton-Lawrence, would like to see the legislation pass second and third readings before Queen's Park shuts down for the summer at the end of June.

Royal assent making the bill law would then follow.

Colle has sponsored the bill on behalf of Beth Jacob High School for Girls, on Lawrence Avenue near Bathurst Street, and its associated Jacob Perlman Seminary, which trains teachers.

The bill, also known as the Talpiot College Act, would accredit the school to grant bachelor, masters and doctorate degrees in eight areas: divinity; Jewish education; family and community services; Jewish law; Jewish philosophy; Jewish women's studies; Judaic studies; and theology.

The college would operate under the auspices of Beth Jacob, in a special wing of the school.

Beth Jacob pursued the creation of a college for Jewish women because "there is a need to provide further education [for them]," Beth Jacob's principal, Rabbi Akiva Stefansky, told The CJN.

"Many girls get married. Many go to Israel. Some teach. But many also want to continue their studies. We felt the need to provide a post-secondary education [for women] in a religious environment," Rabbi Stefansky added.

The high school, founded in the early 1960s, enrolls about 360 girls up to Grade 12. The teacher's seminary, founded in 1973, is training 14 women this year.

The five-page bill sets out the legal requirements on how the college will incorporated, who will serve on its board and how it will be run. Among its objectives are "degree, diploma and certificate programs and courses of study based on an Orthodox Jewish perspective."

Colle told The CJN the degrees granted by Talpiot College would be fully recognized in Ontario and other jurisdictions.

He said the bill is modeled on a similar piece of legislation that passed into law last year. It allowed Redeemer College, an evangelical Christian school in Ancaster, to grant college-level degrees.

Despite the fact that the degrees would have to comply with provincial standards, Beth Jacob and Talpiot College would retain their independence and would not receive public funds, Colle stressed.

The legislation is a private bill, and not a private member's bill, Colle pointed out.

Private member's bills are the result of individual legislators' concerns, and they rarely become law. A private bill is put forward by a particular group or institution, and is sponsored by the MPP in that riding.

Rabbi Stefansky said if the bill passes before the summer recess, the college could be operational as soon as this September.

He said the curriculum would consist of secular as well as religious studies. Depending on the course, "it could be 50-50; it could be 70-30." Tuition would cost $400 per credit.

Talpiot is a suburb of Jerusalem, but is also what King Solomon called the Temple Mount, he pointed out.

In 1969, the Ontario government incorporated Maimonides College as a university degree-granting institution. Today, the college maintains two campuses, one in Hamilton for men, and the other for about 25 women in the B'nai Brith Canada building in Toronto.

Israel's victims of war remembered in ceremony

By ANNA TURKIENICZ
CJN Staff

TORONTO — "We pass from Yom Hazikaron to Yom Ha'atzmaut. Without one there wouldn't be the other. Without the bravery of the heroes of Israel we couldn't celebrate Yom Ha'atzmaut. Not 52 years ago and not today.

"From 1948 to today, over 19,000 people have lost their lives fighting for the State of Israel," Israeli Consul General Meir Romem said at the Yom Hazikaron Assembly held at Beth Tzedec Synagogue last week.

The assembly was sponsored by the Consulate General in memory of Israel's fallen.

"Yom Hazikaron is especially significant this year because it falls on May 8 – VE-day," he said, "which marks the end of World War II in Europe.

"In three years, our people moved from the biggest tragedy of the Jewish people, the Holocaust, to the greatest day of the Jewish people in 2,000 years, the establishment of the Jewish state.

"We could only do this because of the people who lost their lives."

With memorial candles burning under the ner tamid, a short story titled The Same Son by Mordechai Ekstain was read in English by Ira Marcus, the Israeli cultural affairs officer.

The story was written last February to commemorate five years since the death of Ekstain's son, Assaf.

In the story, a photographer has developed two pictures of Assaf.

"Yes, it's the same son," Ekstain tells the photographer. "This is a picture of him as a child, and in this one he is an adult.

"Yes, it's the same son," Ekstain says to God in the story, "the one you gave me and the one you took away."

Ekstain then asks the photographer, "Can I exchange later and move the picture from the hanging frame to the standing frame?"

In the story, God answers Ekstain and says, "I created the familial frame that protected your son from the day he was born and his grave is the frame that protects him today."

Ekstain then turns to God and asks, "Can I exchange later and move my son from the frame of the grave to the frame of the family?"

"Yes," says God, "when you come to me, first chance you get."

"And until I get to God, first chance I get, I miss you child, I miss you man, I miss you son."

Meir Romem

In the hushed sanctuary, memorial candles were lit by Avi Cohen and Sarah Barak.

Cohen's brother, Lieut. Yaacov Cohen fell in 1991 during his military service in the Genin area. Barak's brother, Lieut. David Feldman was killed in the Yom Kippur War in Ramat Hagolan.

Kaddish was read by David Arzam in memory of his brother Yosef Yazamsky, who was killed in November 1949.

"They were the only two in their family who survived the Holocaust," Romem said in an interview after the assembly. "They came [to Israel] as refugees after the war. There were so many who came straight from the boat to the battlefield, where many of them died.

"Some of these soldiers were buried in graves with no names. They too are part of our heritage," Romem said.

"We are grateful to all the volunteers who have helped Israel, including those who came from Canada."

During the ceremony, a letter was read by Yonaton Kessel, the Dror Habonim shaliach. It was written by Offer Feniger, an artist, teacher and nature guide, to his girlfriend, Yael.

Feniger fell in battle, at the age of 24, in the fight for Ammunition Hill in Jerusalem during the Six Day War.

In the letter, Feniger wrote, "We visited the Holocaust Memorial at Kibbutz Lohamei Hagetaot. I looked at the pictures – and I understood – others didn't, they didn't get it...

"I want to know that never again will bottomless eyes stare out from behind electrified fences. They will never stare out again if I am strong! If we will all be strong!"

In the English version of the poem, Parade of the Fallen, Young Judaea shaliach Ryan Hass read that the dead "come from the mountains, from the valley, from the desert... They emerge from the shattered planes and from the burnt tanks... and they pass one by one between two rows of angels... and I look at them... These are my brothers, these are my brothers...

"And the Lord alone passes among them, with tears in his eyes he kisses their wounds, and he says in a trembling voice to the white angels: 'These are my sons, these are my sons!'"

Cantor Paul Kowarsky sang K'El Maleh Rachamim and Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl asked "How is this night different from all other nights?

"On all other nights, we remember our beloved ones – those who live and those who have died. But tonight we remember those who were killed in battle."

This night, like Passover, Rabbi Frydman-Kohl said, symbolizes our journey from humility to praise.

We begin by recalling the wars and the battles and the struggles and we end in the celebration of Yom Ha'atzmaut, Rabbi Frydman-Kohl said.

"Jews all over the world can be strong and free because of the State of Israel and those that have fallen," Romem said.

"Thanks to those who have given their lives, we shall also be able to achieve peace, so that nobody will have to sacrifice his or her life again," Romem said.

In the song, The Winter of Seventy-Three, which was sung at the assembly, "the children [who were born] in the winter of seventy-three... have grown up to be soldiers," and say, "'You promised a dove and an olive branch, You promised us peace – at home. You promised us spring and blossoming – You promised to keep promises!'"

A bill that the premier must quash

Democracy is the supple spine at the centre of our way of life. It carries, without buckling, the full "burden" of our values. It is the sustaining brace of all our institutions, supporting the weight of their gravity, anchoring them lest they sway with the inconstant tides of public opinion.

The core column in that spine is the rule of law. Without it, as we all know, the majority would dominate the minority rather than govern with it, and the will of the people would merely be an obfuscating slogan for nothing less than tyranny over the people.

Among the many interweaving cords in the rule of law, one of the most important is the independence of the judiciary.

In our democracy, judges have never had to fear the reach of the interfering hand of politicians. In return for the freedom from political interference, we have always demanded integrity of our judges, that they be incorruptible, that they comport themselves in a manner consistent with the seriousness of their responsibilities, that they be fair and if possible, wise, but above all else, that they be human. Thus, while we have always hoped for best judgment, we have never expected, nor have we demanded, perfect judgment.

In our system, imperfect judgments can be made more perfect only by other judges.

But there is a private member's bill, having passed second reading earlier in the month, now on the agenda of one of the legislative committees at the legislature in Ontario. It threatens to snap one of the key interweaving cords of the rule of law: the independence of the judiciary.

Last month, Marilyn Mushinski, a member of the governing Conservative party introduced a bill that purports to make judges "accountable" for the sentences they impose in certain criminal cases. "If judges were too lenient," Mushinski said, they might be subject to a "performance review."

However sincere the honourable member's desire to see judges impose penalties on criminals more in keeping with her framework of values, her legislative initiative is wholly inappropriate. At best, it betrays a lack of understanding for the sanctity of the independence of the judiciary in the hierarchy of democratic principles. At worst, it suggests a contempt for them.

It is therefore alarming in the extreme that both the premier and the attorney general of Ontario have thrown their support behind this bill. In the name of the democracy from which they draw their authority and on behalf of which they are purporting to act, we urge them to withdraw support for the Mushinski bill.

Wagner's anti-Jewish sentiments

Henry Srebrnik's feelings in his Letter to the Editor (CJN, May 4) were written with a deep understanding of Richard Wagner's anti-Jewish sentiments.

Some leaders in the music field in Israel are either naive about or oblivious to the sensitivities of survivors and many other Jews, in dealing with this subject. Richard Wagner started from two premises in his treatises: that Jews were alien in thought and feeling, and therefore could not express themselves in German art; and that even if Jews thought and felt like Germans, they would have succeeded no better.

Wagner maintained that "it is necessary for us to explain the involuntary repugnance we possess for the nature and personality of the Jews."

He proceeded to castigate Jews' outward appearance, "which has something disagreeably foreign about it," and Jewish speech, in which "our attention dwells involuntarily on its repulsiveness."

This philosophy is further exhibited in his operas, such as Das Rheingold. There, the evil, ugly, hook-nosed dwarf Albrecht appears, and from him emanate grotesque sounds and grunts in Wagnerian-style "Jewish inflections."

In the 1869 version of Judaism in Music, Wagner states that the alternative to Jews casting aside their racial heritage would simply be "the uprooting, expulsion and destruction of these people." The closing sentence of this essay suggests the solution of der Untergang, meaning the "going under," or more accurately, "annihilation."

When Wagner applied anti-Semitism to the structure of German nationalism, he swept along the millions of Germans predisposed to hate Jews. Wagner's contribution was "proof" that Jewish blood was incapable of producing creative work.

Shevah Weiss, a Holocaust survivor and former speaker of the Knesset, stated that "every orchestra has a right to play what they want, but personally, I feel that as long as we survivors are here on this earth… then Wagner should not be played."

It is not only to Jewish survivors of the Holocaust that Wagner's music represents a vivid reminder of the Nazi regime, it is a reminder to all of us who value decency, respect and integrity.

Holland's horrible truth

As a former Dutch man I am deeply ashamed, and as a Jew I am deeply disturbed, but I am grateful to Manfred Gerstenfeld for exposing the horrible truth about the Dutch war record and the hypocrisy that has been shown for more than 50 years (CJN, April 28).

Whenever I related to people the story of the real actions that took place in Holland during the war, and the actions of the Dutch collaborators, they could not believe that this could have happened in Holland.

I still remember when the Germans held their victory parade in The Hague on the Laan van Meerdervoort on or about May 20, there was another group of civilians joining them. Many of those "civilians" were officers and NCOs still wearing their Dutch army uniforms. When I asked my mother why they were doing this, she could not answer me.

Besides the guilt of having survived, I feel an enormous shame that I will carry with me for the rest of my life.

PM owes apology to Canadians

Re: "Jewish leaders unconcerned over PM's gaffes" (CJN, April 19).

With all the due respect to Moshe Ronen, president of Canadian Jewish Congress, and Rob Ritter, executive director of the Canada-Israel Committee…Prime Minister Jean Chrétien's gaffes were stupid, insensitive and counterproductive, and I cannot understand why Jewish leaders feel compelled to kowtow so as not to offend Chrétien.

His so-called joke about not knowing the difference between east, west, north or south Jerusalem could hardly be expected from any other leader of a western democracy who arrived armed with dozens of advisors. The suggestion that the Palestinians should threaten to unilaterally create their own state surely made the separatists in Quebec laugh with glee.

He embarrassed his hosts and demonstrated a profound ignorance of the important issues in the Middle East. He owes all Canadians an apology.

An appeal to Reform rabbis

As a gay Jew, when I first heard that Reform rabbis could perform gay commitment ceremonies, I was thrilled. When I read in CJN (April 13), that many Canadian Reform rabbis will not do this, it was hard not to feel betrayed. Speaking for myself, my money and volunteer time will only go to the temples where the rabbi would perform a commitment ceremony for me and a Jewish partner.

For the last two years, I have volunteered for Congregation Keshet Shalom (CKS), Toronto's gay chavurah. We do not have the population base to support a rabbi or a building, as do gay Jews in cities such as New York and Los Angeles. My activities with CKS have been at times rewarding, at other times extremely frustrating. The challenge of being gay and a practising Jew is material for a doctoral thesis.

This is an appeal to the Reform Jewish community to go beyond levels of "tolerance" and "acceptance" of gay people, to the level of embrace and support, which would be evident through the performance of same-sex marriages in the temple, and to recognize we are all mishpachah.

The silver brooch

By ROMA GELBLUM BROSS
Special to the CJN

My late mother once owned a silver brooch that she treasured above every other piece of jewelry, even though as jewelry goes, it was not that valuable or impressive. It consisted of an oblong woman's face embossed in silver.

When I first saw it as a child, it was coated with the gray patina of time and was rather dark, but I was fascinated with the thoughtful, gentle expression on the woman's face. If I had known the word at the time, I would have said that her smile was enigmatic. She was beautiful and mysterious. Later in life, it reminded me of Modigliani's portraits.

My mother kept the brooch wrapped in a piece of fabric along with her other jewelry, in a leather pouch she carried on her body when our small family escaped the town of Lodz, Poland, in September 1939, shortly after the German invasion. We fled to the town of Krzemieniec, not far from the U.S.S.R. border.

During our escape from the advancing German front, most of the pieces were gradually sold or bartered for food or transportation, except for the silver brooch and a small triangular diamond ring which had belonged to my great-grandmother; these items remained with my mother.

When I was a little older, Mother showed me the initials V.B. engraved on the brooch and told me they stood for Vincent Brauner, one of the most talented Jewish painters in the town of Lodz. He also dabbled in sculpture and jewelry.

Lodz was an important textile manufacturing town and boasted a large and vibrant Jewish community, animated by the presence of a great number of Jewish artists. Brauner was one of the city's luminaries.

Brauner was a close friend of the family. My mother was an amateur artist and passionate about art and artists. In her stories, Vincent Brauner or, as he was called by friends, Vicek Brauner, stood out prominently as larger than life and an artist of exceptional talent.

She often repeated to me the story of how he came to our house one day, and in one flowing movement of his pencil, sketched my portrait. She was sorry that she hadn't been able to salvage this portrait as well. She was convinced that one day, when the war was over and things returned to normal, her friend would become world-famous.

At that time, we lived in the remote city of Samarkand in central Asia, where we had found shelter. We did not know then that many of our friends and relatives would not survive the war. My mother was quite secretive about her past and she never revealed to me on what occasion she received the brooch from Brauner.

After the war ended, we returned to Lodz and discovered the awful truth. Of a huge family that numbered about 200 people, only a handful remained. I do not know whether my mother ever found out what had happened to Vincent Brauner. It was assumed that if someone didn't surface on the main street of the city or in one of the central coffee houses, he or she had perished.

The brooch travelled with us to Israel, and when my mother followed me to Montreal, in the '60s, the brooch came with her. My mother lived to the age of 93. She died in 1994. For the last few years of her life, I didn't know what had happened to the brooch. After her death, I found it in her safety deposit box.

Here ends Chapter 1 of the story.

Chapter 2 begins with the publication of my first collection of stories, To Samarkand and Back, based on my life as a child-refugee during World War II and its aftermath.

Some time after the book was published, a pleasant woman named Andrea Axt entered my life. A chemist and polarity therapist, Axt is about my age and is also of Jewish Polish origin. We are friends now, but prior to 1992, I didn't know her.

One afternoon, in the fall of that year, I received a telephone call. The woman on the other end, who sounded a little anxious, asked whether I was the author of To Samarkand and Back. When she found out she was indeed at the right place, she was relieved.

She told me that she had borrowed an autographed copy of my book from a neighbour and was very careful not to lose it. She was so careful, as a matter of fact, that she promptly lost it without a trace!

She was very anxious to acquire at least two copies, one for herself, the other for her neighbour, and she was calling me and not the store because she needed my autograph. I invited her over to my house and thus began our friendship.

Actually, Axt bought three books. One was destined for her sister Katarzyna Lipshitz, who lives in Warsaw. Katarzyna, a professional translator, was one of the few Jews who chose to stay in Poland when all the others emigrated.

She requested my permission to translate one of the stories in the collection. Was I ever pleased to have a story translated into my mother tongue!

Lipshitz did a marvelous job. The story sounded better in Polish than in English. Last year, when the re-establishing Jewish Community in Warsaw began publishing its magazine Midrash, they published the story.

In the interim, I began an e-mail correspondence with Lipshitz, an intelligent and well-read woman, and a few months ago, when Axt was going to visit her in Warsaw, I sent her a small present.

Lipshitz reciprocated by sending me a book titled Polyn, written by a well-known chronicler and storyteller, Yehiel Yeshaya Trunk, who used to live in prewar Lodz. The book has been translated into English and Polish by a member of his family, Anna Clarke, who presently resides in Ottawa.

Trunk escaped to New York in 1941 and while there, wrote in Yiddish an informal history of Polish Jews, composed of short accounts and anecdotes. To my delight, I discovered in his book the portraits of a few people I had known or known about.

One of them happened to be the painter, Vincent Brauner! The writer dedicated a separate chapter to him and described him as an idealist, a man of great talent and boundless imagination. Also included was Brauner's photograph – a handsome young man with an intense expression.

This is what Trunk wrote about Brauner in a chapter titled The Don Quixote of Art: "Among the most daring of the Lodz artists were Vincent Brauner – a painter, and Loy Zuntik – a musician. Inseparable, they relentlessly paced the streets of Lodz.

"They were always in a hurry, as if they had been entrusted with some immensely important mission. Brauner's coat collar was always unbuttoned. Pale-faced and tense, he was considerably taller than Zuntik. He wore his blonde hair long, crowned by a wide-brimmed artist's hat; his piercing eyes stared back at the world defiantly.

"Both artists weaved golden fantasies and had ambitious plans for the future. Often, late at night, when the city was deep in slumber after its daily toil, its streets dark, when even the stores seemed to be asleep, you would meet Brauner and Zuntik, still immersed in their endless conversations and in as much of a hurry as if it were daytime and the streets were filled with rushing pedestrians.

"They were beyond the limits of day and night. They were ruled by their own visions and their own private timetables. Brauner spoke of his future works. His visions featured enormous mass-scenes for which he was unable to find a large enough canvas or a big enough wall in all of Lodz. This did not deter Brauner, however. Obstacles never deterred him. He was a citizen of Lodz and therefore the impossible was possible.

"Brauner was strongly convinced that one day an art lover would knock on his door, an art lover who would be as excited about his visions as he was. His patron was not going to be your average Jew either. No, he would be a multimillionaire, the owner of palaces and infinite riches, who would build him an atelier big enough to accommodate his visions.

"He would surround Brauner with comforts and beautiful women. Then he, Vincent Brauner would roll up his sleeves, fetch his brush and turn the entire art world on its head by pouring out on his canvas all the wild imaginings and visions that had been smoldering inside him like lava inside a volcano.

"The entire world, even Paris would then tip their hats to him and admit that they had never seen works such as his, he told his friend Zuntik excitedly and his pale face became suddenly animated and flushed with delight and excitement."

When I next met Axt, I told her about my discovery and about the silver brooch made by Brauner that I had in my possession.

She gasped. "It's really quite unbelievable," she said, repeating it over and over. "It's unbelievable."

Then she told me that Brauner's only surviving niece, Carolina Elly, was her very close friend, that they were almost like sisters. After the war, Elly lived for a while in Axt's home. She now lives in Israel, in the northern kibbutz of Sha'ar Ha'amakim.

Axt rushed home, to e-mail the news to Carolina.

Elly's response came swiftly. She was greatly touched and excited. She asked me to send her a photo of the brooch. She told me a little more about her uncle and about herself. As a matter of fact, she had just finished compiling a book titled Traces, her own family history, she wrote, which was about to be published in Israel.

Perhaps it would be best to quote the letter she wrote: "I am the only daughter of Vicek Brauner's youngest sister. It was a huge family. As far as I know, my grandparents had 17 children. A few died very young. One died in the Polish army during its war against the Russians in the '20s.

"In 1939 they were 12. Only two survived. One of them was the sculptor Ida Wolman-Brauner, to whom I owe my life. She died in 1949 and it was only a short time before her death that she told me we were Jews."

Elly found herself orphaned for the second time in her young life, burdened with a difficult-to-deal-with revelation. For a while, she stayed with Axt's family, then found her way to one of the Jewish organizations and went to Israel.

"In two or three weeks," Elly wrote, "I'll be able to send you a book in which I reconstructed my own history and that of my family. I knew almost nothing about my past until I actually sat down to solve this riddle of my origins and personal history and I managed to delve deeper and deeper.

"The longer I am at it, the more comes to light. Now, when the book is completed, I am literally inundated with information from various sources. In my book, you'll find reproductions of all the works of Ida and Vincent known to me, as well as their photographs.

"I have even found two of my uncle's photographs from the Lodz ghetto, where he perished. Three of the 12 siblings died, separately, on an amazing date, the December 31, 1944, two weeks before the liberation. Vincent died three months earlier, but also a very short time before the end of the war."

I was touched in a strange way by Elly's story. It was a little as if I had found the traces of a lost family member. It was all so sad, so wonderful and so unexpected. It was as if an unseen hand was turning another page in the history of the brooch.

I went to my safety deposit box and took out the lovely brooch, from which the unknown woman was again smiling at me her enigmatic smile. To speed things up, I took a photocopy of the brooch and sent it to Israel.

A few days later, something made me open the book Polyn to the page where, next to the text, there was Brauner's photograph. I placed the brooch next to it. Yes, there was a resemblance. The same longish nose, the oblong face, slightly slanted eyes. The brooch seemed different now, as if it had acquired a new life. They say that an artist recreates himself in each of his works.

In the evening, when I opened my e-mail, there was a very short note from Elly, who has just received the photograph. Like many survivors of the Holocaust, she doesn't express many emotions in her letters, and e-mail messages are less personal than handwritten notes. And yet I detected deep emotion in her few words.

"It seems to me," she wrote, "I'm quite convinced that the woman on the brooch is my mother."

Opinions

Internet trash

By this time, many readers will have learned of the accusation levelled against Amazon.com and Barnes& Noble.com that they promoted anti-Semitic trash on their Internet Web sites. I have not visited the sites recently, but if in fact The Protocols of the Learned Elders of Zion are being advertised there, some serious questions must be asked.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

Booksellers will generally assert that they cannot act as censors, but they know, or should know, that they have some responsibility to let their potential readers know of the dubious quality of some of their offerings.

This is especially true with regard to The Protocols, a forgery that for a century and more has done enormous damage to our people and has contributed to making the Holocaust palatable to all too many.

Since both Amazon and Barnes & Noble have a worldwide clientele, the damage of advertising The Protocols can be potentially devastating. Therefore it is good to learn that both companies have tried to find a middle way between their freedom to let readers judge the value of their offerings and the damage that such books might do.

Abraham H. Foxman, director of the Anti-Defamation League, has issued the following statement concerning the latest developments: "We are pleased that Amazon.com and Barnes&Noble.com have responded positively to our concerns and those of the public, and have instituted ways to alert their customers to the fact that The Protocols of the Learned Elders of Zion is a fake.

"Since we are not in the business of banning books, no matter how reprehensible they may be, we sought and achieved the best solution to inform book buyers. Both Amazon.com and Barnes&Noble.com have demonstrated corporate responsibility and we commend them for it."

Foxman further says that both companies will publish the following statement with regard to The Protocols: "Circulated by the czarist secret police at the turn of the 20th century, it is plainly and simply a plagiarized forgery. The Protocols has been a major weapon in the arsenals of anti-Semites around the world, republished and circulated by individuals, hate groups and governments, to convince the gullible as well as the bigoted that Jews have schemed and plotted to take over the world."

In addition, Barnes & Noble bookstores will no longer shelve The Protocols under "Judaica," but under "World History."

That helps a little, but not a lot. In my opinion, the two companies have no obligation to carry The Protocols at all; however, many people would like to read it. They do not list all the books ever published, and thus they choose what to offer their customers. It is not a question of censorship, but of prudence and good sense.

The great tax debate

Israeli Finance Minister Avraham (Baiga) Shochat has put his reputation on the line with a proposal for comprehensive tax reform. The current Israeli debate on taxation echoes many of the themes familiar to Canadians and citizens of other western countries.

Shira Herzog in Toronto

Over the last two decades, Israel has slowly modernized its tax system and brought it closer to the norms in comparable economies. But while its highest tax level has been reduced, it has retained a complex web of outdated tax exemptions. The most glaring of these has been the absence of any tax on stock earnings, and the absence of any demand for annual reporting on earnings for individuals.

The Ben-Bassat Commission's recommendations are far-reaching. They reduce income tax on middle-class wage earners, while capping the maximum tax level at 50 percent. At the same time, they address numerous activities that have been tax exempt. These include inheritance tax, tax on large financial gifts, rental and sale of real estate, and most importantly, an imposition of 25 percent tax on stock market earnings.

For Shochat, the proposed reform is politically significant and symbolic. Less than a decade ago, as finance minister in Yitzhak Rabin's government, he was forced to retract a proposal for taxation of stock market profits as a result of intense pressure from the business community. At the same time, Shochat agreed to a series of new wage agreements with public sector unions that promised them hefty increases, thereby pushing the country into the recession of the Netanyahu years. His mistake had been ignoring the necessary political groundwork for what had always been a controversial concept.

Although it was clear to all that the exemption from stock taxes dated back to a time when encouragement of investment in the capital markets had been a national priority, a consensus had developed in favour of retaining the privilege. By now, that consensus has shifted to a more realistic assessment of the need for such a tax. If he succeeds, Shochat will regain much of the political ground he lost.

There are a few instructive precedents in the long history of Israeli tax commissions. The first is the success of the Ben-Shachar Commission in 1974. Tax levels were decreased from 82(!) percent, numerous exempt categories were cancelled, and the percentage of tax evaders dropped dramatically as a result.

Ben-Shachar kept the exemption on stock market earnings, due to a perceived need for economic growth in the aftermath of the costly Yom Kippur War. The commission enjoyed the full backing of prime minister Rabin (in his first term of office), and demanded implementation of its report as a complete package and succeeded.

Dan Meridor and Yaacov Ne'eman fared differently as finance ministers in Benjamin Netanyahu's government. Both tried to introduce reform proposals, and both failed, primarily for political reasons. The repercussions were serious for their respective political careers as well as for their relationships with Netanyahu.

The public's position on the matter is especially interesting when compared to the findings of an international study conducted by Angus Reid. Israelis rank highest among fifteen countries (including Canada) in their dissatisfaction with their level of taxation. They oppose higher taxes for more government services, but respond in favour of greater expenditures on health and education.

The contradiction is interpreted as indicative of a general lack of confidence in the government's economic policy, and a belief that there is significant wastage in the public sector. The change in Israeli public opinion is most evident in the slim majority in favour of greater defence expenditures.

Shochat's package will be viewed as a "more-tax" package rather than one that rebalances the system. He can expect opposition from Shas, which positions itself as the party of the disadvantaged, and will argue for maintenance of various exemptions and credits that have historically existed, such as a tax credit for working women.

Shochat has until the end of December to pass the proposal in the cabinet and then through three difficult readings in the Knesset. At the moment, neither he nor Barak has a lot of political credit to spare. It will take all their political savvy to push the proposal through.

More reflections on Passover

Passover illustrates the range of Jewish experience. This year in addition to my two regular seders, I attended a Unitarian seder, invited by a friend who is active in the church. It was a charming event, the 10th seder held by this church. Of the 50 people present, I estimate 10 were Jewish and some of the rest perhaps had ties to Jews. Each table was replete with festive decorations, and had matzah, maror, charoset, kosher wine and a few other seder plate items.

Morton Weinfeld in Montreal

The actual ceremony was extremely truncated but made the basic points. It was all in English – even an abbreviated Dayenu, except for two blessings (I was one of two people in the room who knew Hebrew.) The readings lasted about 30 minutes, and then came the food. Here there was a clear Jewish influence, as the meal included chicken soup with matzah balls, and a first-rate brisket.

The evening was a real learning experience for me. As some readers know, Unitarians are not a true Christian church. Jesus and indeed any kind of Christian God do not figure prominently in the doctrine. Unitarians are open to the ethical teaching of many faiths.

The Passover readings made no mention of Christianity at all. Some church members were Jews in mixed marriages or lapsed Jews – Jewnitarians. But this seder was in no way a covert attempt to convert the Jews.

I later discovered that many of Christian churches of all denominations hold seders; it seems to be a growth industry. In some cases, these seders do have a Christian focus, linking the seder to the last supper of Jesus.

They offer Christians a new set of religious rituals to make up for the loss of others. In other cases, the motives are a concern for promoting tolerance and for simply learning about their faiths.

For some of the Jews, partial Jews, or former Jews who attend, these seders serve as a last link to their Jewish heritage.

While some liberal synagogues have in the past invited churches to participate in seders as a way to promote dialogue, Jews set limits. I cannot imagine even the most liberal synagogue deciding to sponsor, for its own members, a Christmas dinner or event replete with a nativity scene, crosses, communion, some hymns, etc.

At the other end of the spectrum of Jewish experience is A Survivors' Haggadah, recently reissued by the Jewish Publication Society. In my last column I expressed a preference for the traditional version of the Haggadah. But there are exceptions.

One such is the moving Haggadah, written in 1945 and first used by Holocaust survivors in a 1946 seder near Munich. The Haggadah was the work of Yosev Dov Sheinson, a Lithuanian Jew and himself a survivor.

This illustrated Haggadah, written first in Hebrew and Yiddish, interweaves the story of the exodus with the recent destruction and liberation of European Jewry. Paraphrasing the original text it states: "We were slaves to Hitler in Germany…" The JPS version is a facsimile of the original with an English translation.

This Haggadah is powerful in its purity, its raw authenticity, its immediacy, its dignity. It is a testament to the courage and resilience of the survivors right after the Shoah.

There is a Canadian angle to this remarkable story. After the war, Dov Sheinson moved to Montreal, where he and his wife rebuilt their lives. As a child I attended seders in their home but cannot recall discussions of the Haggadah.

Sheinson served for many years as a dedicated teacher and administrator in the Adath Israel Jewish day school. He was steeped in traditional Judaic learning and was a Zionist, yet his brand of Judaism was tolerant of the full spectrum of Jewish identification. Sheinson also developed a successful career as a writer and publisher of textbooks for the teaching of Hebrew and related curricular materials, used not only in Canada but throughout the world. In his efforts to modernize the teaching of Hebrew he was a true visionary.

From a survivors' seder in 1946 Munich to a Unitarian seder in 2000 Montreal, Passover captures the bittersweet flavour of the Jewish past and present.

Defining Israel's border with Lebanon

In accordance with Prime Minister Ehud Barak's election campaign promise to withdraw from southern Lebanon by July 7, Israel has decided that its planned pullout will be based on the only commonly recognized border, demarcated by Britain and France in 1923.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Israel acknowledges that anything less than a withdrawal of this magnitude, though not militarily ideal, would be counterproductive.

An Israeli cabinet minister, Matan Vilnai, put it best when he said that the withdrawal must be complete so that Hezbollah and its Lebanese and Palestinian allies are robbed of the legal grounds for continuing attacks against Israel after July. "We cannot leave the other side any pretext," he explained in a recent interview.

The logic is irresistible, given Hezbollah's declaration that it will continue fighting with all its might if the Israeli army occupies so much as even a metre of Lebanese territory.

Having tasted Hezbollah's resolve and resourcefulness on the battlefield, Israel does not underestimate its threat to carry on the mini-war, Israel's Vietnam, which has claimed the lives of 331 Israeli soldiers in Israel's self-declared security zone since 1985.

Having accepted the need to withdraw to the 1923 international line, Israel, through its United Nations ambassador Yehuda Lancry, has promised to leave no "pockets" in Lebanon. Once it withdraws, Israel, finally, will be in compliance with UN Security Council Resolution 425, passed in 1978 in the wake of Israel's first full-scale invasion of Lebanon (Operation Litani).

Among other things, the resolution calls for "strict respect for the territorial integrity, sovereignty and political independence of Lebanon." UN envoy Terje Roed Larsen – a key figure in the early Oslo peace process – reiterated this point during a recent visit to the region.

Israel's decision to retreat from Lebanon came in the wake of a vigorous internal debate. Shortly after it was announced by the Israeli cabinet on March 5, on the heels of Barak's disappointment that it would not be an integral component of a peace treaty with Syria, the army disclosed its intention to maintain bases several hundred metres inside Lebanon.

Under a plan called Morning Twilight, these bases were to remain in place to compensate for the topographical inferiority of Israeli border settlements like Misgav Am, Manara and Margoliyot, all of which have been vulnerable to infiltration and attack over the years.

The chief proponents of this strategy, Chief of Staff Gen. Shaul Mofaz and Deputy Defence Minister Ephraim Sneh, suggested that Israel would abide by the 1978 rather than the 1923 boundary. "There is no party that can judge what is the border," said Sneh. "We will decide from where to withdraw."

This view was hotly contested by the justice minister, Yossi Beilin, one of the first mainstream Israeli politicians to espouse a unilateral withdrawal, with or without Syria's participation. Beilin argued that a less than full withdrawal would lack legitimacy, encourage Hezbollah to fight on, and undermine attempts to organize a peacekeeping force in southern Lebanon (which will be headed by UNIFIL, the United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon).

Beilin prevailed largely because the Lebanese government let it be known that it would not recognize the 1978 border. In this spirit, Foreign Minister David Levy, reached an agreement with UN Secretary General Kofi Annan under which Israel would withdraw to the pre-1978 frontier.

Israel will need to make difficult and costly adjustments if it honours this accord completely. Forty kilometres of its security fence along the Lebanese frontier will have to be moved southward. More than a dozen military outposts will be dismantled. Buildings in the western sector of Misgav Am, as well as a road near Manara, will have to be relocated. In addition, a reservoir constructed by the Mekorot Water company, some three metres north of the international border, will probably have to be destroyed. Furthermore, Israel will be under pressure to relinquish fields on the western slope of Mt. Hermon that straddle Lebanon's border with Syria.

The complex Lebanese border question is exacerbated by the fact that Israel and Lebanon don't quite agree about where in fact the international border runs.

In 1949, following the War of Independence, the two countries signed an armistice agreement in Rhodes based on the 1923 border. But the agreement was essentially flawed. On closer scrutiny, negotiators discovered that they had somehow overlooked certain gaps, from the Ramim range west of Metulla to the terrain from Hanita to the Mediterranean Sea. Israel's conquest of the Golan Heights in the 1967 Six Day War raised yet another problem. The Alawite village of Rajar was not wholly Syrian, with two-thirds of it jutting into Lebanon.

Israeli troops patrol Lebanese border.

Israel, in response to an upsurge of Palestinian raids in the 1970s and 1980s, made further unilateral adjustments to its border with Lebanon. After Operation Litani, Israel built fortifications slightly north of it and also financed the formation of a now doomed surrogate force, the South Lebanon Army (SLA), recruited from Christian and Muslim villages in the vicinity. In 1980, after a terrorist incident in Misgav Am, Israel moved the border 200 metres northward and westward. By the end of the 1982 Lebanon War, Israel's security zone, counting these minor incursions, comprised 10 percent of Lebanon's overall territory.

Before Israel's withdrawal takes place, however, Israeli, Lebanese and UN cartographers will survey and map the border with a fine toothcomb. If there are still disputes or discrepancies, the UN will be the final arbiter, Israel has agreed.

Since Israel proclaimed its intention to vacate the security zone, Lebanon, presumably under the influence of Syrian President Hafez al-Assad, has issued dire, confusing forecasts about the future volatility of the border area.

Echoing his master's voice in Damascus, President Emile Lahoud warned that a unilateral withdrawal – which would strip Syria of a vital bargaining chip in negotiations over the Golan – could spark a war. Lebanese Defence Minister Ghazi Zueiter joined the hysterical chorus by implying that Tel Aviv would be in range of Syrian rockets.

Then Lebanon threatened to withhold co-operation with the UN unless its demands were met: the disarmament of Palestinian guerrillas in Lebanon, guarantees that Israel would respect its territorial integrity and that Palestinian refugees in Lebanon would be permitted to return to their former homes in Israel, and compensation from Israel for damages inflicted on Lebanese property.

When Israel rejected these conditions, Lebanon meekly backed down. On April 18, Salim Hoss, the Lebanese prime minister, embraced Israel's proposed withdrawal and the need for a UN force to patrol southern Lebanon, but not before he had describing the pullout as "a crushing defeat for Israel."

Syria went through similar gyrations.

Farouk al-Sharaa, Syria's foreign minister, initially predicted that a unilateral Israeli withdrawal would be "suicidal." Since this exercise in scare-mongering, Damascus has toned down its rhetoric. Although Assad obviously prefers a joint Lebanon-Golan package deal, he has grudgingly welcomed Israel's imminent pullout, and has also consented to the deployment of UNIFIL peacekeepers to fill the potentially dangerous void the Israeli army and the SLA may leave in southern Lebanon come the summer.

'Useless' to blame politicians, conference told

Economist Armine Yalnizyan noted that people at the bottom of the income spectrum have "become invisible" to decision-makers. "Not only is there a greater distance between rich and poor," she said, "there are more people moving up as well as down, [so there's] a hollowing out of the middle."

The trend away from full-time work to part-time, temporary or contract jobs – with lower wages and no benefits – has contributed to the erosion of the middle, she said. It also accounts for a lower standard of living co-existing with an increase in actual number of jobs, she explained.

Speaker Kathy Young spoke about how she was able to get back on her feet financially as a single mother – returning to school and "working [her] butt off" – while living in Kehilla housing for seven years, at subsidized rates for part of that time.

Kehilla board member Sarah Kravetz read a speech by scheduled speaker Corinne Kagan, who was unable to attend. Kagan, the grants co-ordinator for the Ontario Neurotrauma Foundation, has had a physical disability since birth. As a consumer of supportive housing for the past 12 years, she faces the "dual challenges of needing affordable housing and [provincially funded] attendant services."

While Kagan pays full market value for her apartment, she noted, her rent was lowered a few years ago when she was temporarily out of work.

"Corinne is one of the success stories," said Kravetz, who is executive director of the Clarendon Foundation, an attendant care service provider. "Providing affordable housing creates an alternative to institutionalization. People who need services often expend valuable financial resources to try to cobble together alternatives."

Blaming politicians for homelessness is "useless," said keynote speaker Anne Golden, president of the United Way of Greater Toronto who chaired Mayor Mel Lastman's Homelessness Action Task Force.

She prefers to offer solutions and has been expressing her frustration since last summer at the failure by various levels of government to take action. She credited the city of Toronto, however, for legalizing "second suites" within homes.

Yair Ron: Perseverance

Yair Ron was injured at age 33. Ironically, just after the Yom Kippur War had ended. His patrol encountered a Syrian ambush and they opened fire. One bullet hit Yair. One bullet that entered his abdomen and destroyed as much as it could. One small bullet that left him paralyzed and confined to a wheelchair, changing his life forever.

With the devotion of his family and friends, who never allowed him to give up, Yair overcame months of excruciating pain and depression.

Beit Halochem was the biggest help in allowing Yair to return to normal life. Rehabilitation meant being given a new chance. Beit Halochem helped him learn to do everything again, managing as independently as he could.

"The truth is, that it is possible to live and to be happy, but it is impossible to free yourself from your disability. It is constantly with you every place and every minute. Thanks to Beit Halochem I have a place where I can belong and feel most comfortable."

Giving to beggars may not be a mitzvah: rabbi

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Giving to a beggar on the street may not be the best way to perform a mitzvah, said Rabbi Dow Marmur, spiritual leader of Holy Blossom Temple.

"It is hard to ignore someone with an outstretched arm, but in the past, the Jewish community has outlawed begging by providing for the poor," he said recently, at the first part of a two-part panel discussion arranged by Temple Sinai, Ve'ahavta: The Canadian Jewish Humanitarian and Relief Committee, and the Native Men's Residence. The sponsor was Caldwell Securities.

Also on the panel was Prof. Debra Britzman of York University school of education and social and political thought; and Prof. Ernie Lightman an economist from University of Toronto's school of social work. Moderator was Nicole Rabba, a sociologist from York University.

Rabbi Marmur, who lives downtown, asked if he has to give something substantial to each beggar in order to fulfil a mitzvah, give to beggars selectively, or give to each one a small amount. "Is that really a mitzvah, or are we leading to their self-destruction if they use the money to buy cigarettes or liquor?

"We should be using our political clout to ensure that social services are available to everyone in need. Instead of [Premier Harris'] $200 cheque being sent to people who do not need it, it should go towards keeping people protected," Rabbi Marmur said.

Philanthropy does not solve social problems, he said, it only embellishes the status quo.

According to traditional economics, said Lightman, the individual is principal. "It is assumed that the individual is competent of making an informed choice, and that he will act to maximize his own well-being. If I feel better about giving a coin to a beggar, then, I will give it. It has nothing to do with the beggar. There is no moral obligation to do anything."

"Economics is a value-free system of analysis," he said. In the traditional model, he said, the beggar gets his money, and the person who gives the money feels good about it.

It's as if those people who don't want help are making an informed choice to freeze and if someone chooses to live on the street, no one has the right to tell him what to do, he said.

In the traditional economic model, when we give a beggar a coin, said Lightman, we are allowing him to act autonomously by not telling him what to do with the money. "If someone wants to use up all the money the first day on drinks, no one has the right to interfere."

From an economic point of view, he said, there is no answer about whether to give a beggar a coin; it is up to the individual. There is no rule. "From my perspective, however, it is a difficult question. My training is in economics, but I am now teaching social work."

We need to think about a value system that has people who have more, provide for the others, said Rabbi Marmur. "That becomes my religious obligation. I want to perform the kind of mitzvah that improves society. I am an advocate of a system based on religious values. Theology that speaks of justice is necessary."

Asked if we should buy a grocery item for a beggar instead of giving him a coin, Britzman said that she would feel uncomfortable assuming what people need. "I acknowledge that someone is standing there, and sometimes I give money, and sometimes I don't. It would become a difficult situation if I would assume what they want."

Giving people groceries does not solve the problem, said Rabbi Marmur. "The poor remain poor, and the rich remain rich.

"The only way to deal with charity is through the social welfare system. We should be using every opportunity to seek a modification of the present 'we-ism', the narcissistic part of society," he said.

Grandeur and detail

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

As we count the days of the Omer, we approach the 33rd day, Lag b'Omer. On this day we change our usual "omer" behaviour and celebrate a holiday.

It is on this day that we believe Rabbi Shimon bar Yochai and his son left the cave in which they had been hiding from the Romans for 13 years. Tradition teaches that during these 13 years Rabbi Shimon was writing the corpus of Jewish mysticism that becomes the central text of the Kabbalah.

He does not create Jewish mysticism, but rather records the secrets that he has learned.

Upon exiting the cave, the great rabbi encounters people going about their daily lives. Some are tilling land while others are conducting business. The rabbi is appalled to see Jewish people neglecting their spirituality by filling their time with mundane matters. In fact, he is so appalled that he sets fire to everything he sees with a mere glance.

The Talmud then states that God admonished him for destroying elements of the world with his fire and banishes him and his son back to the cave for another 12 months.

Upon re-emerging from the cave the rabbi and his son meet an old man who is hurrying home before the Sabbath holding two myrtle branches. When they ask what the branches are for he tells them they are for Shabbat. But why two, they ask and the man responds that one is for the commandment to "keep" the Sabbath while the second is to commemorate the commandment to "remember" the Sabbath.

At that point Rabbi Shimon bar Yochai tells his son to remember this moment and learn from it.

If one involves oneself entirely in spiritual matters and explores the wonders of Jewish mysticism, a danger emerges. It is not the danger of misusing the secretive powers of the Kabbalah, rather it is the danger of viewing the whole and neglecting its parts.

By focusing on the mystical truths of the universe, Rabbi Shimon bar Yochai did not value the details of the universe. Tilling the soil involves us with God's creation and connects us with the Divine. Engaging in commerce builds our society into a healthy and respectful structure in which people are valued and useful. Again we are dealing with God's creations and are connected with the Divine.

God personally admonishes the rabbi for destroying parts of creation and sends him back to refocus his knowledge.

It is the image of the old man who pays attention to the details of the Sabbath that stands as the true lesson. Jewish mysticism is not the understanding of the grandeur of secret phrases and formulas.

The period of the Omer removes the grand celebrations from our community life. Perhaps this Lag B'Omer we can take a moment to remember that God is in the details.

National Bible Contest winners

Jewish students from across Canada recently gathered in Toronto to participate in the 41st Annual National Bible Contest finals.

The 2000 National Contest Finals held at the Netivot HaTorah Day School and the Beth Avraham Yoseph Congregation of Toronto drew more than 200 students from Winnipeg, Vancouver, Victoria, Montreal, Ottawa and Toronto.

All contestants, students from grades 5 to OAC, from both day and supplementary Jewish schools, qualified at regional competitions in February. Students at the national contest competed over a day and a half in one of four groups, an English division for supplementary schools, and three Hebrew divisions for day schools.

The judges for the contest were Prof. B. Barry Levy of McGill University, Dr. Seymour Epstein of the Toronto Board of Jewish Education, Mordechai Mashlai of the Torah Education Department of the World Zionist Organization, and Mr. Mooli Brug, national education emissary of the Jewish National Fund.

The winners in the 2000 National Bible Contest are:

Supplementary School Division — Grades 5 and 6: Eric Wolinsky, Beth Tikvah Congregational School, Toronto; Riva Gold, Beth Tikvah Congregational School, Toronto; Sara Moon, Temple Israel, Ottawa.

Grades 7 and 8: Alexander Ostroff, Temple Israel, Ottawa.

Day School Division — Grades 5 and 6: Malki Feldman, Eitz Chaim (Viewmount), Toronto; Jill Pancer, Akiva School, Montreal; Maayan Anafi, United Synagogue Day Schools, Toronto.

Grades 7 and 8: Leah Radjinsky, Or Haemet, Toronto; Leah Breslow, Eitz Chaim (Spring Farm), Toronto; Saar Warner, Associated Hebrew Schools, Toronto.

Grades 9 to OAC: Eliav Danziger, Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto; Sara Ronis, Hebrew Academy, Montreal; Yakov Frydman-Kohl, Yeshivat Or Chaim, Toronto; and Moshe Halpern, Yeshivat Or Chaim, Toronto.

Internet sites for kids

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Last week, we looked at some of the Jewish sites on the Internet for teens. Today, we're going to turn the clock back a few years and look at places for younger kids to surf.

Sparks is a magazine for children nine to 13 [http://www.sparksmag.com]. There's a section on Jewish Pokemon We'd Love to See!, a Kindness Art Gallery and a section about Jewish Kids from Ages Past. We are introduced to Moses Jacob Ezekiel, who was the first Jewish cadet enrolled at the Virginia Military Institute in the 1860s. We are told about the anti-Semitism that he faced and we are challenged to write in about how we would react.

Torahtots definitely has a message that "learning is fun," and your kids should enjoy their stay [http://www.torahtots.com/]. It's full of stories, games and colouring pages. One of the central points of the site is an explanation of the current week's Torah reading in Parsha On Parade. In the music section, the songs are lively and have names like Totsland, Skibble Dibble and Hodu LaShem (Praise God): "Every soda pop, every clip that clops, every two fives for a 10, every ring around the collar, and the medicine you swallow, proclaims, Hodu L'Hashem."

Would you like to play a game? ZigZag Inc. claims to produce the best Jewish Games on the Web [http://www.zigzagworld.com/]. Best of all, they are all free and you can play them online. ZigZag was founded in 1996 by doctors Ted and Marsha Hopp, a husband-and-wife team of computer professionals in Gaithersburg, Md. Their Web site is a delight – full of online games such as Dress the Torah, Why Don't Zebras Play Chess? and the frustrating AlefBetGo! Your browser must be able to handle Java to play these games.

Do you remember those handheld puzzles where you were challenged to slide the little squares in as few moves as possible to create a picture? Well, now you can do the same thing online when you are challenged to put a map of Israel back together [http://www.bus.ualberta.ca/yreshef/funland/funland.html]. Other challenges at Jewish Funland include a Hebrew vocabulary quiz, a wordsearch game and Hebrew Hangman – the classic game, using Hebrew words.

Has your child heard Goodnight Moon one too many times? Well, there is an alternative. Jewish Bedtime Stories has dozens of tales contributed by parents around the world [http://www.jcn18.com/scripts/jcn18/forum/forum_fairy_tales.idc?ForumID=63&TopicID=4].

And if you are still looking for more Jewish Kids' sites, then I highly recommend the Children's Judaica page [http://members.tripod.com/ProudMommy/judaica.html].

Finally, a few technical comments: Please note that some of these Web sites have lots of special effects and if your computer isn't up to snuff, it could crash. You will need a recent Java-enabled browser of Netscape Communicator or Internet Explorer. In addition to RealPlayer 7 Basic program [http://www.real.com/player/index.html?src=000508realhome], you will probably need Flash and Shockwave Players from Macromedia [http://www.macromedia.com/shockwave/download/]. All these programs are free.

Should you have trouble installing these programs, just ask your child for help.

Mourning state of Jewish affairs

By RABBI AARON FLANZRAICH

It certainly seems as if the ingredients for a summer of discontent are all well in place. From this vantage point in the heart of Toronto, the Leafs have lost their quest for a Stanley Cup yet again, so mourning will be in vogue a while. While I do not mourn their loss, I do mourn a few others. And despite what many people may think, it has very little to do with the past, although its roots are to be found there.

No, for me, what I mourn and lament more than most is the state of Jewish affairs today.

It seems almost bewildering, when you get down to thinking about it. The Jewish people today are freer, more invested, more infra-structured, more endowed, more comfortable than ever before. So why does it seem that we are more restricted, divested, broken down, ignored and uncomfortable than ever before?

The proverbial finger of blame can land squarely on all of us. Because, the last time I had occasion to look, there are no bands of Cossacks chasing after us, and no mass deportations of Jews worldwide. No, our problems are truly of our own making. The blame lies with us.

The problem is that we have an inherent inability to accept and really get along with one another. I say this not in lofty conceptional language, but the facts on the ground are the facts. The divisions between all the streams of Judaism have hit an all time low, and the various leaderships of the Jewish world are doing little about it.

Yes, we all talk about it, but everyone seems to have "the solution" based on his or her comfort level. Few, if any, are prepared to make any sacrifices in the name of Jewish peace. I do know that for many, the things that divide us seem to be of global, or even divine, significance. But I really wonder about that, and question if that is true. I guess it all comes down to what you think God expects from us.

This week we will be reading the Torah portion of Behar, and in it we can find a remarkable key to this problem. We begin by reading, "And the Lord spoke to Moses on Mt. Sinai saying..." As simple as this sounds, it astounded our sages. Why is it that right in the middle of the third book of the Torah we revert back to the revelation at Sinai? Does it not seem out of place?

So our tradition reminds us that there is no sense of chronology attached to the events of the Torah, there are different purposes at work here. But both Rashi and the Ramban, two prolific biblical commentators, tackled this problem in a different way.

Rashi reminds us that every mitzvah in the Torah was given at Mt. Sinai after the exodus from Egypt. The Ramban writes in his attack on Rashi's position, "and this seems not to be accurate in my eyes at all." He continues to contend that the revelation continued throughout the 40-year desert wandering.

The two positions are light years apart, and they strike very different chords in how we perceive the Torah and its revelation. And I wonder, if both Rashi and the Ramban can share the same page in our Chumashim (Bibles), why can't we get on the same page as well? I know that we feel a great deal divides us, but not nearly as much if we fail to accept our differences.

I am certain that behind the depth of our differing theologies and Halachah there is a God waiting, patiently, for his children to finally get the message that beneath all of the processes of Jewish life there remains a purpose. Let us not lose it.

Rabbi Flanzraich is spiritual leader of the Beth Sholom Synagogue in Toronto.

Agunot, peace concern Efrat's chief rabbi

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Rabbi Shlomo Riskin

TORONTO — Rabbi Shlomo Riskin is known as someone who stands up for his ideals.

Founder and former spiritual leader of the innovative Lincoln Square Synagogue in New York, a PhD from New York University's department of Near Eastern languages and literature, an early advocate for Soviet Jewry, modern Orthodoxy and advanced education and opportunities for women within Orthodoxy, Rabbi Riskin, the chief rabbi of Efrat, is a well-known speaker, author and teacher.

Rabbi Riskin spoke to The CJN during a recent visit to Toronto.

His current project – or one of them – is to create a special court in Jerusalem where rabbis could "nullify a marriage, if the husband is acting improperly, in cases of extortion, for instance."

The problem of the agunah, the woman whose husband will not give her a get, a religious divorce, is one in which Rabbi Riskin has been involved in a very practical way.

Although there is room in Jewish law for the rabbis to "coerce" a divorce, "the courts are loath to use [that power]," he said.

Israel, he said, has a higher percentage of agunot than anywhere else. One major reason, he believes, is that until recently, there have been no women advocates, women who can speak for those seeking a divorce in a rabbinic court.

There are now, however, some 60 or 70 women advocates practising in Israel, and another 30 are being trained.

A strong advocate, he said, can explain the situation to the judges, which the woman involved may feel unable or embarrassed to do. Also, he said, there may be facts that the Halachah insists are grounds for divorce, but require someone knowledgeable to bring them to the court's attention.

"The problem is not Halachah," the rabbi asserted. "The problem is how it is interpreted."

The results achieved by the women advocates he said, have been gratifying. Some 150 "hard cases" have been solved, and there is even a separate court for agunot.

The Knesset is being urged to pass a law that would punish a recalcitrant husband by withholding all licences, such as professional or driving licences.

A hotline giving advice and assistance is being widely used, even by secular women, he said. There are three full-time advocates on staff at Jerusalem's hotline, and similar hotlines have been requested in Tel Aviv, Haifa and Safed.

"There is even a Palestinian woman lawyer who wants to open one for Palestinian women, who also have problems protecting themselves in the divorce process," Rabbi Riskin said.

He insisted that "there is a precedent" for rabbinical courts to try very hard to prevent women from becoming agunot as much as possible, for example, by granting divorces by fiat, rabbinic decree.

The rabbi isn't nearly as optimistic about the peace process. "Peace," he said dryly, "requires two partners."

Citing inflammatory rhetoric by Syrian officials, Yasser Arafat's wife Suha's accusations that Israel poisoned Arab wells, and Arab television and school textbooks, he said that "as long as the rhetoric is not tempered, we would be ill advised to give up anything."

As well, he said, "the Arabs constantly up the ante. First they wanted the Golan, then the Galilee; and now Arafat wants Ramot and French Hill."

Rabbi Riskin blasted the "so-called intelligentsia in Israel, the post-Zionists," who are questioning the right of Jews to be in Israel and are "rewriting school texts to question our right to come home."

The Arabs, he said, see this trend as weakness.

"Israeli leadership has to believe in itself, and in the justice of our cause. If we are [seen to be] strong, the Arabs will be willing to negotiate."

There have always been Jews who are more interested in being citizens of the world than in being proud Jews, he said.

"I don't understand that. If you can just as easily be a citizen of Hong Kong, then why not go to Hong Kong, or even to Uganda [as Herzl suggested]. We have lost our sense of purpose."

A passionate Zionist, Rabbi Riskin pointed out that "despite all our differences, in 51 years, no country has done so much in uniting people from the entire sociological, cultural and colour spectrum, building strong educational and economical systems, and creating a high quality of living."

Concluding the interview in a reflective mood, Rabbi Riskin said, "I believe in the common sense of Israel and the Jewish people. For that reason, I am optimistic about the future."

Missionaries want symbol as own logo

Earlier this month, Mitch Glazer, president of Chosen People Ministries, headquartered in North Carolina, was cross-examined by CJC's lawyers behind closed doors at the Federal Court. Early next month, Prutschi will be similarly questioned by lawyers for Chosen People Ministries.

And in September, a judge of the Federal Court's trial division is expected to begin public deliberations on who may use a menorah as a federally registered, legally protected emblem.

This tug-of-war over an ancient symbol began in late 1998, when two Toronto lawyers who specialize in intellectual property spotted Chosen People Ministries' semi-circular menorah in a journal that publishes trademark applications for the public to see. The lawyers alerted CJC.

Anyone wishing to oppose an application can do so to the Registrar of Trademarks at the Canadian Intellectual Property Office in Ottawa, an arm of the department of industry. CJC filed a strongly worded statement of opposition, saying the menorah is a Jewish symbol and that the attempt to adopt it by a group that works "specifically to convert Jews to Christianity" is "scandalous and immoral."

CJC was later joined by B'nai Brith Canada, whose symbol since 1875 has been a menorah. BBC blasted Chosen People Ministries' attempt to trademark the menorah as a "blatant misrepresentation of Christianity as Judaism."

But unbeknownst to Jewish advocacy groups, Chosen People Ministries had also applied to register its menorah as an official mark, which is different than a trademark.

A trademark protects a symbol that is used to distinguish wares and services.

But an official mark is said to be superior. It protects any badge, crest, emblem or mark used by "any public authority" in Canada. The mark may be used on wares – including sweatshirts, pens, coffee mugs, calendars, bumper stickers and books – and on services, such as dissemination of religious literature via the Internet.

One of CJC's questions to the Court is why the government deems Chosen People Ministries a "public authority."

"We're definitely challenging that," Prutschi said.

As well, CJC says applications for official marks are not published beforehand. They can only be challenged in court.

Between 1997 and 1999, Chosen People Ministries applied for official mark status for its menorah three times, and was rejected. Finally, on its fourth attempt, the application was approved last November, at exactly the same time as CJC became aware of the trademark application.

That's when CJC launched its case, which seeks a judicial review of a government decision.

Meanwhile, both sides have agreed to put the battle over trademark status into abeyance.

Rich of Chosen People Ministries said an official mark offers more security and "is harder to get" than a trademark.

He stressed that it is not a standard menorah the group is trying to protect, "but a stylized version of the menorah. It's been registered in various other countries with no problems."

He said his group simply wants to keep using the emblem on its printed material and promotional items, and avoid legal problems down the road. "We don't want there to be any confusion."

Congress was caught off guard by the approval of the official mark because no public notice is required. "It flew under our radar screen," Prutschi explained. "It's not challengeable" the same way as trademarks are.

In the meantime, CJC is marshalling evidence to show that menorahs are used by a host of Jewish groups in Canada, including Jewish Family Services in Montreal, the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem, the Vaad Ha'ir of Montreal, several synagogues, Jewish Women International, the Canadian Council for Reform Judaism and State of Israel Bonds.

But Congress believes no Jewish organization in this country has ever registered the menorah as a protected symbol.

Teens' project aimed at helping Israeli children

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Three Toronto teenagers are following the adage "from generation to generation" by emulating the philanthropic and leadership roles of their parents and grandparents.

Brandon Koffler, 16, Sam Jonas, 14, and Jeffrey Warshafsky, 14, recently founded a tzedakah project dedicated to encouraging Canadian youth to help less fortunate Israeli children have a better quality of life.

The recipients of their personal generosity and creative efforts are the children at 14 Israel Children's Centres, most located in impoverished and disadvantaged areas throughout Israel – from Kiryat Shmonah in the north to Beersheva in the south.

Koffler was the initiator of the new project. He says it is a tradition in his family to donate money to a charity to mark a special occasion. When he had his bar mitzvah, his grandparents, Marvelle and Murray Koffler, suggested that some of his gifts be directed to the Israel Children's Centres.

The centres, which received Israel's highest award, the Israel Prize for excellence in children's programs, offer such programs as Arab-Jewish Coexistence, which was created to bridge the rift between Israel's Jewish and Arab youth, as well as numerous programs for children with special needs – physical handicaps, developmental disabilities, hearing impairment or autism, as well as children at risk in their environment.

Emulating philanthropic, leadership roles of parents, grandparents

When he visited Israel, Koffler went to a centre. "It came to me that it would be a great idea to have children in Canada direct some of their bar and bat mitzvah gifts to these Israeli children," he says.

On his return to Canada, he decided to donate most of his bar mitzvah gifts to the children in the Children at Risk project.

When Koffler made the presentation at a fund-raising event for the children's centres, he issued a challenge to parents and grandparents to encourage their families to follow his example.

Robin and David Jonas attended the gala and spoke to their son Sam about making a donation in honour of his bar mitzvah. He agreed and purchased a wheelchair for an Israeli child.

Naomi and Neil Warshafsky also encouraged their son Jeffrey, an enthusiastic tennis player, to share his bar mitzvah gifts.

His mother searched the Internet and found that the Israel Children's Centres highlighted tennis for the handicapped.

"I grew up knowing that I should give some of my money to people who need it more," says Warshafsky. "And the tennis aspect made it even more exciting."

Several months ago, Janice Segal, co-ordinator and foundation director of the Canada-Israel Children's Centres (CICC), called the three boys together and they formed the New Young Leadership group with its own board.

Their mission statement outlines their goal: "To raise awareness of CICC through the bar/bat mitzvah project."

Their first task is to interest other young adults in participating in the tzedakah project. Their goal is to raise $25,000 in the year 2000 for the children of Israel. To date, they have raised $10,000.

The teenagers told The CJN that in addition to seeking donations and initiating other fund-raising projects for young adults, they hope to attract others to join their organizing committee.

Koffler noted that more than 300,000 children have been helped since the first centre opened in 1976 as a tennis centre.

Kevin Green, CICC president, and Robert Barkin, vice-president, are spearheading the young adults' projects. Green says he is moved and inspired by their conviction and leadership.

"I hope what they have started is contagious. It is a tribute to their parents that their children are already contributing to the community. I can only hope to set the same example for my own children.

"This new program involving children helping children and the participation of these committed teenagers is extremely refreshing and I am looking forward to many years of growth and continued success in helping the children in Israel."

As a side benefit, the three teenagers agree that along with the good feeling they have in helping others, they are delighted that the project has brought them together.

For more information on the New Young Leadership Project or the other programs of the CICC, call Janice Segal, 905-660-1999 or fax 905-660-1990).

Community targets services at 'gap' generation

By SIMONE JOSEPH
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — They are caught in the gap. Too old to belong to youth groups such as B'nai Brith Youth Organization. Too young to be attracted to programs for parents. They are the 20 and 30-something graduates just out of reach of on-campus Hillels and Jewish student organizations.

This "gap" generation has become the target of burgeoning new groups, programs and services across Canada.

"The community has woken up and are doing things that are interesting to young people," said Richard Diamond, national chair of the UIA Federations Canada Young Leadership executive.

The community is packaging a better product, he said, in the form of social programs, fund-raising, educational and religious programs.

Ilana Krygier, director of Adult and Judaic Education at the Calgary Jewish Centre, says it is important to bridge the gap between young adulthood and parenthood.

"We hold their hands all the way through BBYO or USY and Hillel and all of a sudden, it's like 'bye — go be a Jewish adult now'," she said.

About 2½ years ago, six members of the Calgary Jewish Centre approached Krygier and said the centre should have programs for people their age. (They ranged in age from 23 to 30).

Jewish Adults of Calgary (JAC) was formed, and has grown to include 170 people on its mailing list.

"By Calgary standards, it is a pretty huge list and people are added every day," said Krygier.

She believes the "gap" generation formed because of a societal change.

"People have extended their young adulthood. People are not getting married at 22 or 23 right out of university," she said.

Before JAC was formed, events for young adults in Calgary were held once every few months or only once a year, said Krygier.

"It was very inconsistent. It was hard to find a place in the community where these young people would fit in," she said.

In London, the federation has wanted to get young people involved, but there was a perception that few people in the "gap" generation lived in the city. It was thought that most young people lived on campus at either The University of Western Ontario or Fanshawe College, had left London or had young families, said Aviva Orenstein Kalin, program director for the London Jewish Federation.

But Orenstein Kalin found members of the "gap" generation and in August, the London Jewish Federation's Young Adult Division (YAD) held its first event – a Shabbat dinner. YAD now has a mailing list of close to 280 people, a mitzvah committee, an outreach committee and is starting a fund-raising committee in the fall.

Across the country, most communities have assigned staff to work with young leadership which was not the case in the past, said Maxyne Finkelstein, executive director of UIA Federations Canada, the umbrella organization for local federations.

UIA Federation is hiring a director of leadership development and about two years ago, it formed the Canadian Young Leadership Executive, a body which organizes conferences, retreats and missions. This school year, Jewish Campus Services of Greater Toronto hired a new staff member to co-ordinate programs for graduate students and young professionals.

But for some organizations, catering to the "gap" generation is not new.

The State of Israel Bonds New Leadership Division for people in their 20s to early 40s has been around for many years, said Elan Levitan, national director of public relations. While the division started out small, it now has several hundred people on its mailing list.

"We're thinking a lot about what kind of activities, programs and investments would appeal to that demographic," he said.

Next month, Israel Bonds is holding an event specifically directed at young adults. They will be showing The Life and Times of Hank Greenberg, a movie about the famous Jewish baseball player.

"It is all part of trying to recognize the interests and needs of this demographic," said Levitan.

Another example — Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University's New Leadership Division for 25 to 40 year-olds — started in 1985 with 10 young professionals and now has between 40 and 50 active members and a mailing list of two to three hundred.

With ample programming in parts of Canada, some members of the "gap" generation are happy with what is available. Noam Goodman, a 30-year-old lawyer in Toronto, says he has felt connected to the Jewish community in the six years since graduating from York University's Osgoode Hall Law School. He has been invited to a number of UJA's young leadership activities and to many fund-raising events.

Dorian Barrs, a 29-year-old McMaster University graduate who now works in Toronto, said he is satisfied but disinterested in Toronto's young Jewish scene.

But 25-year-old Ben Silverberg, who moved to Hamilton two years ago to begin working as a cantor at Beth Jacob Synagogue, said he was disappointed to discover few programs for people his age.

Since his move, he has made plenty of connections with older people through the synagogue but says he is still searching for people his own age.

Few young people attend religious services at his synagogue, he said.

"They are not driven towards synagogue

Jewish academics to gather in Edmonton

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — People from across the country will take part in the annual conference of the Association for Canadian Jewish Studies, to be held this year in Edmonton on May 28 and 29.

The bilingual organization with about 350 members, also known as Association d'études juives canadiennes, was founded in 1976 as the Canadian Jewish Historical Society. Its goals are to encourage scholarly research in Canadian Jewish history, life and culture.

The conference is part of a larger conference umbrella, the Congress of Social Sciences and Humanities, which facilitates the organization of conferences by several different organizations in subject areas such as history, philosophy or literature.

Randal Schnoor, program chair of the conference, says that among the association's activities, it produces an annual academic journal featuring articles about the Canadian Jewish experience, and a biannual newsletter that contains updates of local events of Jewish interest. The president is Prof. Ira Robinson of Concordia University.

This year, the association is partners with Beth Shalom Synagogue, which is hosting the first day of the conference. It will be open that day to the public, and the keynote speaker is Prof. Morton Weinfeld of McGill University, who will speak on The Gevalt Reflex: An Optimistic Perspective on Jewish Continuity and Unity.

The conference, to be held at the University of Alberta, will feature 17 scholars who will share their knowledge of the Canadian Jewish experience. One session will be devoted to the western Canadian Jewish experience in Edmonton, Calgary and Saskatoon, and there will be, among others, talks on anti-Semitism, Jewish self-hatred, and an examination of the lives of Holocaust survivors in Canada.

Next year, the conference will be held at Laval University in Quebec, and in 2002 it will be in Toronto, co-hosted by Ryerson Polytechnic University and University of Toronto.

For information on the association, check its Web site at HTTP:\\home.OISE.UToronto.ca\~acjs. or e-mail Schnoor at rschno@po-box.McGill.ca

Negev gala concert planned

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Los Angeles-based cantor and entertainer Herschel Fox, one of Winnipeg's favourite expatriate sons, is returning to his hometown on June 20, and he is bringing along some special friends.

Cantors Benzion Miller, Yaakov Motzen and Aaron Bensoussan represent the Voices of Tradition, the billing for the Jewish National Fund's third annual Negev Gala Concert.

They are "the three tenors" of the Jewish world, says Rami Kleinmann, the new JNF shaliach in Winnipeg. He describes the concert as promising to be "a Hollywood-style evening of classical Jewish opera."

Fox, who will emcee the evening, ranks Miller and Motzen as the world's two greatest chazzanim.

Motzen grew up in Israel, where his father was the chazzan for the Ponevitch Yeshiva and the Modzitzer Rebbe. Miller grew up in Brooklyn where his father was chazzan for the Bobover Rebbe.

Miller is one of the foremost interpreters of liturgical music, and he is comfortable with opera and Jewish folk songs. He has sung with the Israeli Philharmonic, the Jerusalem Symphony Orchestra and the Haifa Symphony.

Motzen has performed all over the world including on a tour behind the Iron Curtain. A few months ago, Fox says, Motzen gave a performance at the Hollywood Bowl for an audience that included the Dalai Lama. "The Dalai Lama went bananas when he heard Yaakov," says Fox.

The two world class cantors are very good friends, Fox notes, and have appeared together many times. They have appeared at Fox's shul in Los Angeles four times and have performed with Fox 19 times over the years.

"I provide the colour and Yiddish stuff, and comedy," Fox says.

"Motzen and Miller both have a great sense of humour. They know each other so well that they can tell each other's stories on stage."

Recently, Bensoussan, the third member of the trio, replaced Cantor Louis Danto at Toronto's Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue. Although born and trained in Morocco, Fox says, Bensoussan has also learned Ashkenazi chazzanut and is in the top ranks of both Sephardi and Ashkenazi chazzanim.

The multilingual tenor can perform in Hebrew, Ladino, English, Yiddish, Italian and French.

Fox has performed with the trio a number of times in Toronto and Montreal. This will be their first Winnipeg show.

Also on the program will be the presentation of the JNF's Bloomfield Medal of Honour to Norm Vickar, a past president of the JNF for Manitoba and Saskatchewan. Vickar is the only Jewish cabinet minister in Saskatchewan's history. He and his wife Florence, moved to Winnipeg to be near their son and two daughters.

Quebec joins Israel, PA to create industrial park

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Shimon Peres, Israel's regional co-operation minister, and Quebec deputy premier Bernard Landry announced they are working on the establishment of a tripartite industrial park with the Palestinian Authority.

At a joint press conference, Landry said the project will enable Quebec to make a contribution to the peace process in a very practical way.

"It will be a modest contribution; we are not yet a state, but we can participate as a nation. We want to help as best we can our friends in the Middle East. It won't be diplomatic or glorious; it will be very materialistic," Landry said.

The idea was proposed by Peres during the economic mission Landry led last fall to the Middle East. In addition to Israel, Landry and the representatives of close to 40 Quebec businesses and agencies visited the Palestinian Authority, Egypt and the United Arab Emirates.

Peres said the plan is to situate the industrial park right on the border between Israel and the Palestinian Authority where it will be in a position to equally benefit the two economies. In addition, it will serve as an example of the peaceful and profitable coexistence that is possible between Israelis and Palestinians.

"The time has come for the two peoples to trade minefields for magnetic fields... Good relations are better than great guns," said the 77-year-old Nobel Peace laureate.

The plan is that Quebec businesses, with the help of the Quebec government, would set up on-site, along with their Israeli and Palestinian counterparts, and profit by having access to both neighbouring markets.

Other tripartite industrial parks are already in place, he said, in collaboration with both countries, including Germany and Italy, and with American states.

"We want a coalition of private enterprises and governments to come in and contribute to peace on an economic basis, not as a donation," said Peres, who was in Montreal chiefly to speak at a Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University dinner.

Landry hosted Peres at a private luncheon earlier in the day.

Quebec will be sending a delegation to Israel in June to conduct a feasibility study of the project, Landry said. It seems likely the park will focus on technology, given Quebec's growing strength in that sector. About 15 of the companies that went on the mission last fall were in information technology.

Peres said he envisages the park being in operation within one to two years.

Landry said the Canada-Israel free trade agreement, which came into effect in 1997, and the Quebec entente signed with Israel later that year to increase commercial and technological ties laid the groundwork for Quebec's participation in such a venture.

The Caisse de dépôt et placement, the province's pension fund manager, and the Société générale de financement, a government agency that invests in private ventures, have shown an interest already in the industrial park.

Peres expressed pleasure at doing business with Landry. "He is the first minister of finance I've met who is not pessimistic, who is not complaining, who expresses hope."

He also lauded Quebec's economic transformation. "Thirty years ago, Quebec was a land of industry. Today it is one of the most advanced leaders in high technology."

Asked if he agreed that Quebec is a nation like Israel, as Landry had stated two days earlier, Peres' terse reply was "that is a decision for one people to decide. They do not need a license from anybody."

In response to another question, Peres said Israel has requested membership in La Francophonie, the international association of countries where French is spoken as a first or second language, and expects the application to succeed because of reduced opposition from Arab countries at the present time.

He said Israel can rightly take its place in La Francophonie because of the large number of Israelis, especially Sephardim, who speak French. Peres himself is fluent in French.

Landry added Quebec's support for Israel's admission, noting that French is a more important language in Israel than it is in the countries of many of the current members.

Targeting the 'gap' generation

worship. They are not flocking to Saturday morning services. In fact, when I see someone between 20 and 30 in my synagogue on a Saturday morning, it is very rare," he said.

Silverberg believes the root of the problem is a lack of young people in Hamilton. Many native Hamiltonians go away to university in Toronto and end up staying in the city after they graduate, he said.

Michele Schneider, program coordinator of the Jewish Community Centre of Hamilton-Wentworth and area, said attendance at past programs for the "gap generation" has been as low as five to 10 people.

"We found that gearing programs specifically to that age group does not work."

So, the centre tries to involve these young people in wider community programming, instead of holding separate programs for them, she said.

Wendy Schneider, of the Hamilton UJA FEDERATION, says "the problem is if you are single and Jewish in Hamilton — the perception is there is not a lot happening."

So Schneider has invited young people to what she calls "parlour meetings" to discuss the strengths and weaknesses of Hamilton's Jewish community. In committees formed to plan programs for specific age groups, she did notice interest from the "gap" generation, she said.

Ben Silverberg believes the solution to strengthening programming for the "gap" generation in Hamilton is to entice people with social programming.

"First establish the social then the religious — I think that is the only way to be successful."

Do you think YOU might have OSTEOPOROSIS?

Are you a postmenopausal woman, aged 65 to 80, worried about your risk for osteoporosis?

Osteoporosis is a loss of bone mass. In Canada, one in four women over the age of 55 has this condition. Osteoporosis:

- develops over time without symptoms
- most often affects postmenopausal women
- could result in a spinal fracture or cause them to break a wrist or hip

Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care needs volunteers to participate in an osteoporosis study.

You may be eligible to participate if you have never been told you have osteoporosis.

If you are interested in volunteering, please contact Laurie Bernick at (416) 785-2500 ext. 2525

רעדאַגירט פֿון: אַלעק סילווער

י. ל. פרץ, צו זײַן 85טער יאָרציים

The scorn of a rebuffed politician

Scene in Ottawa

By G.K. SIMCOE

The Canadian Alliance is on the move and everyone is getting caught up in the draft. It is, of course, the Progressive Conservative party that has been most affected.

We have, in the past, examined Joe Clark's singular ability to focus on the wrong things at the wrong time, make the wrong choices and miss the signals that are plain for all others to see. Like many politicians, Clark's most dominant characteristic is his arrogance, a flaw that paralyzes his ability to objectively assess a situation and results in an absolute conviction of the "rightness" (excuse the pun) of his position.

One of the consequences of such misplaced certainty are the shock and resentment that inevitably follow when the politician discovers that his or her position has been rejected. This kind of resentment can ultimately yield feelings of betrayal, a sense that the people upon whom one has relied have abandoned the only one possessed of the true vision.

Rebuffed politicians take rejection seriously and personally. Almost by instinct, they look for someone to blame. But they sometimes go one step further. They extend the "blame" to anyone or any groups who may have had a substantial connection with the original "transgressor." Too often, a rebuffed, dejected politician extends blame to the Jewish community, whose leaders are often involved in lobbying efforts in support of any number of causes. We have seen politicians on the Hill carry resentments of an election loss or a defeat on a policy issue to the larger Jewish community. And that resentment translates into a punitive, child-like impulse to "hit back."

Joe Clark never forgave the Jewish community for the so-called Jerusalem fiasco. And, the payback came during his many years at External Affairs when he put in place more than a few policies hostile to Israel. Other politicians who expected more support from the Jewish community have equally long memories and an equal thirst for retribution.

The moral of the story is simple. When a Jewish activist, however defined, establishes a relationship with a politician or a political party, he or she must always be mindful of what the possible implications are for the larger Jewish community. Such a perspective may not be fair, but it is realpolitik.

Cotler addresses Yom Hazikaron ceremony

By MICHAEL REGENSTREIF
Special to the CJN

MONTREAL — "Israel is the homeland of the Jewish people across space and time, wherever we may be and whatever our citizenship may be," said Mount Royal MP and international human rights lawyer Irwin Cotler.

It is imperative, he added, "to remember those who fought and died so that Israel may prevail."

Cotler was speaking to an overflow crowd in a small room in the Gelber Conference Centre of the Jewish Community Campus. His address followed a solemn ceremony in front of Cummings House on the eve of Yom Hazikaron, the day of memorial for the almost 20,000 soldiers who have died defending Israel since 1948.

Yom Hazikaron committee chair Allan Sheff described the gathering as "a demonstration of solidarity with the State of Israel."

The ceremony, conducted under a gloomy sky with some rain, included a prayer service led by Rabbi Ronald Aigen of Congregation Dorshei Emet, readings in Hebrew, English and French by high school and CEGEP students, songs from the Shaar Hashomayim Choral Society, the laying of wreaths and an address by Shlomo Avital, consul general of Israel in Montreal.

Avital said that he was "very proud" and "deeply moved" to see the large gathering of the community "on this solemn occasion when we express our solidarity with the parents, widows and orphans" whose loved ones "paid the heaviest price in defence of the State of Israel."

"Each year," Avital said, "we remember all who fell. We cry and we go on, because we have no choice, no alternative."

One of the most moving moments in the hour-long ceremony came as Sheff and Rabbi Aigen read names of some of the volunteers from Canada who have died over the years in defence of Israel, as well as the names of several Canadians who have fallen victim to Arab terrorism in Israel.

After the ceremony, many moved into the conference centre where two programs were offered, a quiet musical program and Cotler's address on the importance of Yom Hazikaron to Diaspora communities.

Cotler spoke passionately as he contrasted the observance of Yom Hazikaron in Israel and in the Diaspora. He explained that the day is a central observance to all strata of Israeli society. It is a day of mourning there

Canadians honoured for fighting in Israeli war

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — The Israeli Embassy began the Yom Ha'atzmaut week with a ceremony to commemorate and honour the 250 Canadians who fought in Israel's War of Independence and the 11 volunteers who gave their lives.

Israel Ambassador David Sultan unveiled a plaque with the names of the volunteers who died. He then thanked all the volunteers for their contribution.

"It was long overdue," he said. "I decided that we had to do this before I leave Canada and as it is close to Yom Ha'atzmaut, the time was opportune."

Many of the 250 Canadian volunteers were present on May 5, coming from as far away as Edmonton to receive the recognition for their contribution to the establishment of the State of Israel. Throughout the room, stories abounded. Many of the volunteers had not seen each other in many years.

Amir Maimon, a counsellor at the Israeli Embassy, recognized their presence and introduced his assistant, Anna-Lee Chiprout, who described the volunteer efforts during the War of Independence.

"During the War of Independence," she said, "some 3,500 volunteers from 37 different countries rallied to Israel's defence. These young men and women, Jews as well as non-Jews, were known as Machal (Mitnadvei chutz la'aretz) the Hebrew acronym for overseas volunteers.

"Many of the volunteers had been members of Jewish underground movements in Palestine and abroad before the state was proclaimed, or had served as crew members on Aliyah Bet ships running the British naval blockade to bring holocaust survivors to the shores of the land of Israel."

Henri Cynamon, attended the ceremony from his home in Edmonton. He was born in Poland but spent World War II in Belgium. From there, he volunteered to go to Israel.

"At the end of 1951," he said, "I came to Canada for a visit. I went home, married my sweetheart in Brussels and we returned to Canada in 1953."

Leon Krym, who now lives in Toronto, was in the Warsaw Ghetto uprising during World War II. Following the war, he moved to Paris, where he was in 1948 when Israel's War of Independence broke out.

Having been in the Warsaw Ghetto, Krym said it was like going "from fire to fire; but there was no comparison – at least we were fighting as free people."

Cantor Daniel Benlolo chanted the K'El Maleh Rachamim in a moving ending to a very moving ceremony.

52nd birthday celebrations

OTTAWA — The local community came out in full force to celebrate Israel's 52nd Independence Day together.

In what has become an Ottawa tradition, the community celebration took place on the eve of the holiday, immediately following a solemn Yom Hazikaron memorial service for those who lost their lives for Israel.

The evening was chaired by Sara Vered who shared her personal experiences of growing up in Israel and her memories of the War of Independence.

Dramatic readings by Debra Davis and Barry Karp, musical entertainment by the SJCC Zimriya Chorale Ensemble under the direction of Cantor Daniel Benlolo and a medley of Israeli songs performed by the Hillel Academy Choir rounded out the festivities at the Soloway Jewish Community Centre.

His Excellency David Sultan, ambassador of Israel to Canada, reminded the community that in 1949, Israel was home to only five percent of our people; today, it is home to 40 percent.

He also took the opportunity to bid farewell to some members of the community. "This is the fourth and last Yom Ha'atzmaut that my wife and I will celebrate with you," he said. "The encounter with the community has been a wonderful experience for which we are grateful."

The following evening, Sultan entertained members of the diplomatic community at a reception at the Chateau Laurier Hotel where they sampled a variety of Israeli finger foods and wines.

New group promotes awareness of head, neck cancer

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
CJN Staff

TORONTO — After Mark Daniels completed his treatment for cancer of the salivary gland and was declared cancer free, he wanted to give something back to the doctors who had treated him

When his doctor told him that no one was raising public awareness about the need to find a cure for head and neck cancer, Daniels set out to establish a charitable foundation to raise funds for research and public information about this area of cancer.

He told The CJN in a recent interview, that the first fund-raising event, a dinner to officially launch the Head and Neck Cancer Foundation, took place last month, and the next fund-raiser will be a golf tournament, which will be held at the Richmond Hill Golf Club Thursday June 1 at 11 a.m.

The executive director of the foundation, Daniels, 43, noted that head and neck cancer is the fourth most common type of cancer, and if caught early, is usually not fatal.

In August 1998, Daniels discovered a small lump on the back of his neck. Ten days after his biopsy, Daniels got the bad news. "I had salivary gland cancer. "The gland on one side of my neck had become overgrown with a cancerous tumour. It's a fairly rare form of cancer."

Mark Daniels

Surgery was a risky procedure, he said. "The cancer had grown around a nerve in the neck that controls the muscles on one side of the face, and the doctors were afraid the surgery might cause permanent facial paralysis."

The four-hour operation was a success. The next stage of treatment was radiation therapy.

Daniels said he had to wear a special clear plastic mask "that fits your face like skin" with holes cut out so the radiation could penetrate his face directly.

"I went every day for 30 days, seven days a week. The treatment was no more than 10 minutes…When they do this radiation, you lie down on a table and they bolt the mask to the table. You can't move a millimetre. It's an extremely difficult 10 minutes.

"By the 13th or 14th day you feel the effect. At first you get a little tired. You start to develop a burn on your face and neck."

He said, the burn spread to the inside of his cheek and throat. "The burns become so severe, you don't want to eat or drink. The process of chewing food becomes abhorrent. Then you lose your sense of taste and smell."

Daniels said some people with head and neck cancer lose so much weight they have to be hospitalized.

He lost 30 pounds, but he forced himself to eat and take vitamins, he said. "I refused to give in. I made food every night. When I couldn't chew it, I made milkshakes with protein powder and sipped them all the time."

A field operations manager for a realty company, Daniels said he was told he'd be too tired to work, but he went for three or four hours a day, and he made himself walk five miles every night. "It was more like dragging than walking."

The same determination fuelled Daniel in his efforts to set up a charitable foundation for head and neck cancer a year ago, when he had regained his strength.

He said he was able to to fast-track the application for charitable status through government red tape, and he succeeded in enlisting the support of influential medical professionals and lay people to sit on the board.

The purpose of the foundation is to provide information and support to people with head or neck cancer and to raise funds for research, Daniels said.

"We want to create an outreach program that's personal. It will be Web-site based…This will be geared to the lay, support person who's helping someone going through the illness

"Part of it is going to be geared to train dentists to know what to look for."

Medical researchers will be able to apply for grants to fund new research through the foundation's Web site, he said, adding that the foundation will also foster the exchange of information between researchers.

For more information about the foundation or golf tournament, contact Daniels at 817-6366.

Israel and PA miss the latest peace 'deadline'

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Israel and the Palestinians have opened back-channel talks in an effort to overcome their differences.

Palestinian officials were quoted last Sunday as saying that the speaker of the Palestinian legislative council, Ahmed Karia, had travelled to Sweden for talks with Israeli Public Security Minister Shlomo Ben-Ami.

Reports in Israel said Ben-Ami was accompanied by Israeli attorney Gilad Sher, who is considered a confidant of Prime Minister Ehud Barak.

The reports about the back-channel talks came as Israel and the Palestinians missed another deadline for reaching an outline for a final peace deal. The two sides had agreed earlier this year on a May 13 deadline after missing a similar deadline in February.

As negotiators continue to make little headway, tensions have been increasing in the West Bank and Gaza Strip. For the past week, Palestinian protesters have been clashing with Israeli soldiers during demonstrations aimed at securing the release of Palestinians jailed for security crimes against Israel.

On Sunday, at least 20 Palestinians were injured during the clashes.

In Gaza, hundreds of Palestinians threw stones and gasoline bombs at Israeli soldiers near the Netzarim junction, blocking the entrance road to the Jewish settlement. Similar clashes also took place in the West Bank town of Ramallah.

Sunday's unrest came as Israeli and Palestinian negotiators met in Jerusalem, but were unable to agree on the prisoner release issue.

At the weekly cabinet meeting, Barak briefed his ministers about the unrest. He described the mood on the Palestinian street as "charged and tense."

Palestinian negotiator Saeb Erekat told reporters that the talks were in a crisis that could only be resolved with an additional prisoner release.

Israel's chief negotiator, Oded Eran, said the talks could only make progress if the Palestinian Authority quelled the current disturbances.

Meanwhile, Barak continued efforts to rally coalition support behind his plan to transfer Abu Dis and two other Arab villages on the outskirts of Jerusalem over to full Palestinian control.

Barak is waiting to hear whether the haredi Shas party will support the proposal. The National Religious Party has already said it will pull out of the coalition if the proposal is approved.

Yisrael b'Aliyah, which has said it would oppose the initiative, was expected to make a decision on whether it would take a similar stand.

Sydney Olympics have security fears

By JEREMY JONES
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

SYDNEY, Australia — The Palestinians are reportedly considering a Muslim and Arab boycott of this summer's Olympic Games here because of a memorial to the Israelis killed in the 1972 Munich Olympics massacre.

The claim in the Palestinian publication Al Hayat al-Jadida of a boycott due to the memorial, which was dedicated in October, was subsequently denied by the Palestinians' representative in Australia.

But the publicity given the February report – which came as Australian Prime Minister John Howard and Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat met in the Gaza Strip last week – threw the spotlight on Israel's security concerns as preparations for the Games begin.

Members of the Israeli Olympic Committee visited Sydney last week to discuss security arrangements for Israeli athletes.

The Palestinian representative in Australia, Ali Kazak, claimed there are no plans at this stage for a boycott, but that the Palestinians are demanding the memorial be removed.

Kazak said that if the memorial remains, there should also be memorials to the Olympians he claimed the Israelis had murdered in Lebanon and elsewhere.

He could not specify who he was talking about and when this had taken place.

A senior official in the Israeli delegation was quoted in the Australian media as saying, "We will have to take measures. We need to make sure that Munich '72 will not happen again."

Eleven Israelis and five terrorists died in 1972 after Palestinian terrorists kidnapped Israeli athletes in Munich's Olympic village.

Latest Iranian 'confessions' spur concerns for accused

By MICHAEL J. JORDAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — Six of the seven Iranian Jews who have gone before Iran's Revolutionary Court have "confessed" to spying for Israel.

The first plea of not guilty came on Wednesday of last week, as 31-year-old Farzad Kashi, a religion teacher, told the judge he did not pass sensitive material to the Mossad, Israel's foreign intelligence agency.

Earlier in the day Kashi's brother, Faramarz, 35, reportedly admitted he was guilty of such activities.

Western advocates, however, remain adamant that the allegations against all 13 of the Iranian Jews on trial are unfounded. They maintain that the hearings are a scripted political show trial.

The hearings were slated to continue Monday.

In Ottawa last week, Liberal MP and international human rights lawyer Irwin Cotler condemned the trial as a "travesty of Iranian and international justice... a prosecution and persecution of innocents that violates every canon of a right to a fair trial as guaranteed under the Iranian constitution and international law."

In a statement released by Cotler's office, the member of Parliament for Mount Royal, who has been involved in the case for over a year, detailed what he called a number of violations of the defendants' rights to a fair trial, referring to them as a pattern of prosecutorial abuse.

That Farzad Kashi pleaded innocent was either part of the script or perhaps a small act of defiance, said Malcolm Hoenlein, executive vice-chairman of the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations.

"It means Farzad didn't bend to the pressures being applied," said Hoenlein, who has closely monitored the hearings.

At the same time, advocates like Hoenlein have two new concerns – that the string of admissions may be creating strains in the global coalition that has rallied to the defence of the accused, and that within Iran the admissions are provoking persecution of the entire community of 25,000 Jews.

"The concern we have is that too many well-meaning people are starting to doubt themselves," said Hoenlein.

"As each one confesses, people on all sides are asking, 'How can they all be confessing?' But they don't understand the circumstances under which these confessions are being made."

At a closed hearing last week, Ramin Farzam, 36, and Nasser Levi-Haim, 46, also a part-time Hebrew teacher, allegedly confessed.

Levi-Haim's confession, in particular, startled advocates, who had been led to believe by their sources within the Iranian judiciary that religious leaders in the community would not be lumped into the group of so-called conspirators.

After the hearing, Levi-Haim reportedly told reporters: "I swear on the Torah, in whose service I have been for 40 years, that I was under no duress in court to confess. I got religiously involved, and I was tricked by Israeli agents."

There appears ample reason to be skeptical about his confession. As Cotler pointed out last week, "The Iranian Revolutionary Court is notorious for its violations of human rights. In this court, the judge leads the investigation, conducts the prosecution, determines the verdict and hands down the sentence. Indeed, the court spokesman [was] already discussing the defendants 'right to appeal' after only the first day of the trial. The guilty verdict [had] apparently been determined.

"Some of the accused have been in prison for almost 16 months, where their only contact with the outside was five minutes a week of supervised time with their families, through thick glass and monitored telephone. The other 10,075 minutes of the week, they were under the influence of the authorities," said Sam Kermanian, secretary general of the American Iranian Jewish Federation in Los Angeles.

The Iran 13 would also be well aware of the fate that has befallen other Iranian Jews accused of spying.

Since the Islamic Revolution in 1979, 17 Iranian Jews have been executed, most of them having been convicted of espionage.

There are signs that many in the Iranian public are reacting negatively to the aired confessions. Media reports from Iran state that Jews – even Jewish children – are now experiencing harassment on the street, at work and in school. There are reports of anti-Jewish graffiti and fears of an economic boycott of Jewish-owned shops.

One Jewish woman, the wife of one of the spy suspects, reportedly pleaded with photographers outside the courtroom to not take her photograph.

"I work at a health clinic, and I don't want any problems," she was quoted as saying. "I don't want people pointing fingers at me."

That some outside observers are now wondering if the 13 are in fact guilty of the charges is prompting worry among activists in the West for the ultimate fates of the accused.

The Week in Israel

May 8

• As a security precaution prior to the 48-hour period of national commemoration and celebration, Israel imposed a closure on the West Bank and Gaza.

• Israeli media reported that Yemen's top religious leaders issued an edict banning normalization of relations with Israel.

• Israel media reported that Leah Rabin is suffering from lung cancer and is undergoing tests in the United States.

May 9

• Yom Hazikaron. Israel remembers 19,109 soldiers who have died since Nov. 29, 1947.

May 10

• Yom Ha'atzmaut.

May 11

• At its 52nd birthday, Israel's population is 6.3 million. Of the total, 4.9 million are Jews, 891,000 are Muslims, 110,000 are Christians and 99,000 are Druze.

• A joint Israeli-Palestinian soccer team is slated to play against a celebrity team in Italy later this month.

• President Ezer Weizman said he intends to step down by the end of the year, but did not give a specific date. Weizman collapsed from dehydration during a Yom Ha'atzmaut celebration.

May 12

• Israeli media reported that Prime Minister Ehud Barak had offered to transfer 64 percent of West Bank land to full Palestinian Authority control immediately and another 14 percent on a conditional status for a trial period. Under the plan Israel would retain 20 percent of the land. The PA rejected the proposal.

'Miracle' cemetery in need of repair

By BRAM EISENTHAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

OUDERKERK AAN DE AMSTEL, Netherlands — Some five miles outside of Amsterdam, there is a site where a miracle took place during the Holocaust.

Here, in this tiny town with quaint, pretty houses and narrow streets, the Nazis allowed Jewish history to survive. At a time when they were desecrating Jewish burial places all over Europe, they left this one alone.

"No, the Germans didn't destroy the Beth Haim Cemetery. Jews who were already dead were of no use to them," said Rabbi Rodrigues Pereira, administrator of Beth Haim for the past decade.

"What they did do was reduce the 5,000-strong Portuguese Jewish community to several families who were, of course, unable to meet the financial burden of preserving the cemetery," said Pereira. The maintenance costs alone are more than $75,000 each year, he added.

Now, however, what the Nazis did not destroy is being ravaged by time and neglect, and the cemetery administrator is trying to raise the money to restore it.

The Portuguese Jewish community, which settled in Amsterdam in 1590, purchased an estate to bury their dead. The first burial at Beth Haim took place April 11, 1614, of a child named Joseph, son of David Senior. The memorial stone is inscribed with a poem in Hebrew and is still quite legible.

Two years later, the cemetery was in official use and could be accessed by road as well as by boat via a nearby river. The cemetery was extended in 1663 – and twice more over the years.

It was originally estimated that the space would be depleted by 1963, but the ravages of World War II ensured it will last for another 80 years. Eight hundred spaces are still available.

Beth Haim, however, is a victim of time. Many of its stones are damaged or missing. Thanks to the diligent work in 1866 of David Henriques de Castro, much is known about stones that had, for instance, sunk into the marshy ground.

Those of special historical or artistic merit were raised on brick bases to prevent further submersion, while the remaining ones were covered with earth. De Castro's findings were published in his 1883 book, Keur van Grafsteenen, A Selection of Gravestones, which is being re-issued.

Many famous people have been buried in Beth Haim. Perhaps the most famous is Rabbi Menashe ben Israel, a friend of artist Rembrandt van Rijn, who, apart from making etchings of his friend, also illustrated many of his books. Rabbi Menashe, together with Rabbi Jacob Sasportes, was able to persuade Oliver Cromwell to allow the Jews to resettle in England in the 17th century, said Pereira.

Many visitors to Beth Haim leave notes on the tomb of Rabbi Sasportes, renowned in his time for battling false messiahs. Indeed, the grounds provide a fascinating look at the culture of the day.

Engraved upon some of the stones is art that is at once macabre, whimsical and poignant. This is in stark contrast to the latter-day section, featuring bleak, modern stones for deceased Jews like Salomon Nunes Nabarro, son of Rebecca and Jacob Nabarro, inscribed "in Auschwitz did the Nazis murder (his parents)."

The Holocaust is recalled in a small memorial area, commemorating the thousands of community members who perished at the Westerbork camp or were murdered elsewhere during World War II.

A fund bearing the name of David Henriques de Castro has been set up to restore and preserve the cemetery. They're looking to raise $3.5 million.

"Beth Haim must not be allowed to just fade away," Pereira said. "Even if it is just to give those people who lost parents and grandparents during the war a place where they can find their ancestral roots."

Inquiries may be made to the David Henriques de Castro-fonds Foundation, Kerkstraat 7, 1191 JB Ouderkerk a/d Amstel, or e-mail bethaim@wxs.nl.

York U. opens alumni chapter in Israel

By VIVA PRESS
CJN Israel Bureau

SAVION — York University recently inaugurated its newest alumni chapter in Israel.

On May 11, Ambassador Michael and Mrs. Linda Bell hosted about 60 York graduates and professors at the Canadian Embassy.

"I think it's a terrific opportunity for the alums to connect with one another," said Florence Weinberger, head of the Office of Development.

Michael Loftus, who will serve as head of the local chapter, agreed.

He said the new alumni chapter here is a "wonderful opportunity to both keep connections with York University, and also bring the best Canada has to offer to Israel."

Martin Lockshin

York University has alumni branches in Calgary, the Golden Triangle (Kitchener/Waterloo/ Guelph), Ottawa, Vancouver, Hong Kong, Paris, Singapore, Tokyo and Washington.

In its 40-year history there are already more than 150,000 graduates worldwide.

Gary Smith, vice-president of university advancement and a former diplomat, who among other postings served as Canada's ambassador to Israel in 1981, told those in attendance that the newest alumni branch is important because "we want to stay in touch with you and we want you to stay linked up to the university."

Weinberger said the university knows of 100 York alumni in Israel, but estimates there are at least double that here. "Everywhere I turn, I see people I know are not on the list," she said.

Jonathan Fine, a linguistics professor at Bar-Ilan University in Tel Aviv, came out to the inauguration to "meet lots of new people I didn't know were here." Fine, who graduated with a BA from Glendon in 1971 and with an MA from York University the next year, said he "would take good interest in York alumni events if they took place."

Marty Lockshin, who has been at York University for 22 years, told the crowd that "we're very proud of you who are here in Israel. You're our York ambassadors."

Then, he added, that he's "jealous" of those who live here and who made aliyah. He and his wife Ruth are on a sabbatical in Israel for the year.

One of the attendees was Dorit Efrati, an Israeli who graduated with a BA and MA (1984) from York University. Efrati, was supposed to study psychology at the University of Toronto. But upon her arrival there, the registrar's office told her that the letter of acceptance she had received in Israel was "a mistake."

With only $40 in her pocket, and a cheque for $600 for tuition, the U of T registrar told her there was no possibility of her being accepted. However, they suggested she try "the other university."

"I'm very excited about the alumni chapter here," she said at the embassy in Savion, just north of Tel Aviv. "I wanted to meet new people."

Weinberger said she hopes the Israel branch will be successful – that is, in terms of attracting people to its events.

"Most universities judge the success of their alum chapters in terms of how much money they make, not us, at least not yet," she said. "We judge in terms of turnout. The Hong Kong chapter is new and is successful in the sense that people come out to events."

Weinberger said she hopes Israel's chapter will have at least two events a year.

Loftus, who graduated from Osgoode, but is not a lawyer in Israel, mingled among the alumni and fielded ideas for future events.

Hora Galgalim: A dance you won't soon forget

By VIVA PRESS
CJN Israel Bureau

TEL-AVIV — "There will be no gum chewing or talking during the performance," Orly Ba'or tells the women dancers in the Hora Galgalim (Hora Wheels) troupe. "And," she says, turning to the men, "you have to make sure you're always in two straight lines."

It's a beautiful, sunny Friday morning, but these 14 men and women are inside practising folk dances for their upcoming performance. The group, making only its third international appearance, will be performing in Montreal and Toronto on May 29 and 31 respectively. Singer Ilanit will also be performing.

Ba'or, the choreographer, wants them to be perfect. She presses play on the stereo, and tells the group to get into position for a run-through. The men and women do as they're told. And the first dance number begins.

Hora Galgalim is a typical Israeli folk dancing group with one exception: the men can't walk. They're all paraplegics, injured during their service in the Israel Defence Forces. The women are volunteers – though they dislike the term, preferring to be called simply members of the dance troupe.

Eight years ago, Adam Greenfeld was the chief credit controller at Pioneer Concrete when he got a call-up for his annual reserve service. He returned home a paraplegic, after falling off a guard tower.

"It's very exciting," Greenfeld, 46, says of being on stage.

"My parents are survivors of the concentration camps and they built a family," he says. "Relatively, you can't compare [the situations]. I'm not cheerful of my situation, but I look at the future."

In fact, only after Greenfeld was hurt did he fulfil his childhood dream of becoming a dancer.

The Hora Galgalim troupe will be touring Canada.

Now a self-employed consultant, Greenfeld dances weekly with the Beit Halochem dance group. He's also one of seven men – the group attracts about 50 people each week – who will be performing in Toronto and Montreal.

"There's no place in the world that has a dance troupe like this," says Joseph Luttenberg, national chair of Beit Halochem. "Just because someone is in a chair, he still has his wants and passions. Here he has a chance to dance with his friends."

For Sammy Dahan, dancing with his friends is the main reason he comes to the group.

"Before it's a troupe, it's a group of friends. Hora Galgalim is tons of fun. We laugh, we dance together, we celebrate one another's birthdays, etc. If it wasn't fun, I wouldn't do it," he says.

Injured at the age of 19 in a training exercise, Dahan now competes in just about every sporting competition. He's an athlete in the truest sense of the word, and he refuses to let being in a wheelchair slow him down.

"I'm in charge of what I do, I don't let my injury get in the way," the 47 year old says, pointing out that he has won more than 20 medals representing Israel in events including water skiing, badminton, tennis, and dancing. He also teaches other people with disabilities how to water ski.

"Hora Galgalim shows people that their war injuries are not the end of the world. You can still learn, get married, have kids," says Luttenberg.

Dahan and Menashe Reichman are two such examples. Both got married after their injuries. Dahan, who is married, has four daughters aged 16 to 21.

Though dancing in a wheelchair sounds impossible, Hora Galgalim shows it's very possible.

The men and able-bodied women are in perfect harmony as they snake their way across the stage, looping in and out, and making formations. After each dance they quickly change costumes – from shiny sequinned outfits to hassidic garb.

"I always hoped they'd be successful. I always dreamed of seeing them on stage," Ba'or said. She started the group 11 years ago. "There's no reason handicapped people can't enjoy dance."

Their program, Dream and Reality, focuses on five major themes: love, memory, Beit Halochem, tradition, and Israel.

Ba'or says the dance of remembrance, in which the men are dressed in army uniforms, is one of her favourites. She says when she first saw them in the uniforms, she felt very emotional.

As for the men, they didn't mind putting on the greens again. "It's just another costume," says Greenfeld. "It's a bit of a déjà vu."

Luttenberg is happy the troupe is embarking on another international performance. "Jewish communities don't always see the reality and the price people in Israel pay for the state – they read about it in papers, but they don't actually see the price," he explains about the importance of war vets going to the Diaspora.

"Our visits make a very strong connection. There's no other chance for them to meet these people."

Now the Toronto and Montreal communities have a chance to meet these courageous men in a dance they won't soon forget.

One of Israel's most talented singers will be joining the Hora Galgalim group on their Canadian tour. In fact, Ilanit can be said to be Israel's national singer.

Her song Balalaika is just one of many famous folk songs in her repertoire. Her velvety voice has been heard over the airwaves for over 30 years and has won the Singer of the Year Award nine times.

Because of her fluency in languages, Ilanit, who speaks and sings in Hebrew, English, Spanish, Portuguese, French, German and Yiddish, has been called Israel's singing ambassador. She has represented Israel in the Eurovision Song Contest twice and has participated in other international festivals.

Judaica 2000 looks ahead to art of the millennium

By JOYCE SINGER-D'APRILE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The goal of the exhibit at A Show of Hands Gallery is to indicate where Judaic works are headed, or where they can head; to take traditional ceremonial objects and really push them, says the gallery owner, Sara Levine Petroff.

The gallery is known for its focus on three-dimensional craft works, in glass, ceramics, jewelry, mixed media and textiles.

The current show, Judaica 2000, is a prospective look ahead to a new millennium through contemporary Judaic works.

On May 4, members of the Jewish community gathered at a reception to honour the talented international artists represented in this thought-provoking exhibition of ceremonial and spiritual works.

Highlights include awe-inspiring sterling silver ceremonial pieces by Moshe Zabari of Israel and Piet Cohen of Holland.

"The fact is that we're able to lead our lives in a very innovative, technology-based way. People are starting to integrate their religious life too," Levine-Petroff said.

Five of the participating artisans are not Jewish. "It looks as though, from their work, they were a little freed-up from traditional concepts, as they did not have the historical rootedness," she said.

STUDY DRAWING, PAINING AT KOFFLER THIS SUMMER

Instructor Paul Peregal inaugurates a unique drawing and painting course this summer at the Koffler Gallery on north Bathurst Street.

The Toronto-based artist, whose work figures prominently in many collections internationally, combines practical studio experience with an exploration of the techniques of 19th- and 20th-century masters such as Van Gogh, Picasso, Matisse, Kokoschka, Soutine, Bacon and Freud.

The course melds history with studio investigation, offering an in-depth look at these artists' works through slides, videos and occasional trips to galleries.

"It is imperative for artists to study the techniques of the past and integrate these ideas into the consciousness and work of the present for any true development to occur," Peregal says.

June 27 to Aug. 17, afternoons or evenings on Tuesdays and Thursdays. Koffler Gallery, Bathurst Jewish Centre. 416-636-1880.

Heart-rending film should be savoured

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Paul Morrison's Solomon and Gaenor is a sensitive, ultimately heart-rending film of a doomed romance in early 20th century Britain.

The protagonists are two starry-eyed lovers whose plans run aground on the shoals of tradition and prejudice.

Solomon and Gaenor, which opens on May 19 at the Cineplex Odeon chain, is linguistically unique, as it unfolds in English, Welsh and Yiddish, a combination unprecedented in the history of cinema.

Taking place in Wales' coal mining region, it is set in 1911 against the backdrop of bitter industrial unrest which unleashes the dogs of anti-Semitism.

Starting innocently enough, it begins as Solomon (Ioan Gruffudd) a Jewish door-to-door salesman of cotton goods, encounters Gaenor (Nia Roberts), the daughter of a Baptist mining family, on one of his daily rounds.

The rebellious scion of Orthodox Jews, Solomon is smitten by the demure Gaenor, and returns to her house the following day for a friendly chat. Calling himself Sam Livingstone, Solomon conceals his Jewishness and claims to be British.

This is hardly surprising, given the casual though rampant racism which pervades the town. This is a place where the odious phrase, "Jew-boy," is lamentably common.

Thanks in part to a lovely red dress he presents to Gaenor one fine day, Solomon wins her heart. The chemistry is clearly there, but their budding fling faces immense obstacles.

In a series of carefully-wrought scenes which establish the limits of their secret relationship, Morrison shows us how societal and religious factors work formidably against them.

Without even knowing that he is dating a Christian woman, Solomon's Orthodox parents, steeped in the mores and values of the eastern European shtetl, remind him that Jews and Christians are like oil and water and should not mix.

Similarly, when Solomon meets Gaenor's strict, chapel-going parents, the realization hits home that the cultural gap between Jews and non-Jews is simply unbridgeable.

Despite the harsh realities imposed on them, Solomon and Gaenor continue to see each other furtively, and their intimacies result in the inevitable – Gaenor's pregnancy.

Her condition prompts a Welsh suitor to denounce Gaenor " for fornicating with a stranger." In short order, much to her family's shame, she is excommunicated from the chapel.

Nia Roberts as Gaenor.

Violinist Lenny Solomon finds musical expression in jazz

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Although classically trained, Juno Award-winner Lenny Solomon is known mainly as a jazz violinist.

"When I was a teenager, my friends were playing in rock bands. I couldn't play piano or guitar, but I could play violin, so I put a pick up on it, making it loud, and started to play pop, rock and jazz in a modern North American blues-based style," says Solomon.

Fans of Lenny Solomon's '70s group, Myles and Lenny, will have a chance to introduce their kids to his amazing talents when the internationally renowned Toronto born violinist, composer and arranger joins the Toronto Symphony Orchestra for two Young People's Concerts at Roy Thomson Hall.

Solomon's father, Stanley, was a violist with the orchestra for 42 years.

"I grew up in a very musical family. It was my desire to play the violin since I was a little boy because my dad played viola and my sister Maribeth, who is now a composer for film and TV, played piano," Solomon says.

Solomon studied at the Royal Conservatory of Music and McGill University. He credits violinist Albert Pratz, a former concertmaster with the TSO, as the mentor who took him under his strings 28 years ago.

"It was fascinating at the time to play the music of a teenage generation. Over the years I've honed my sound. It has become more sophisticated as my tastes have developed into more of a jazz sound."

Solomon was Jazz Report's Violinist of the Year for '94, '95 and '96 and his achievements have included headlining in '75 at Ontario Place in front of 12,000 fans with then partner Myles Cohen, and opening for Frank Zappa at the Montreal Forum.

In addition to acting as concertmaster on the Jimmy Page/Robert Plant tour stops in Toronto and Buffalo, Solomon has recorded with Liza Minelli, Anne Murray, John McDermott, Nigel Kennedy, Raffi, John Dankworth, Prairie Oyster, Michelle Wright, Soul Asylum and Led Zeppelin.

Jazz musicians Peter Appleyard and Ruby Braff joined Solomon on his 1992 debut CD, After You've Gone. His latest CD is the Gershwin Sessions.

Solomon has included classical pieces like Bach's Double Violin Concerto with his work with The Galaxy Trio, a touring and recording jazz group that includes Israeli violinist Moshe Hammer and pianist Bernie Senensky.

"I have an exciting project this summer. I am putting together a group called World on a String to debut on Canada Day in Hanover, Germany at the Expo 2000. The group features 10 of Canada's top violinists and fiddlers from jazz, classical, country and Celtic and a five-piece group that includes my wife Wendy on cello.

"I'm compiling and writing music, trying to amalgamate the different styles into a sound," he says.

"There is a lot of interest in this group in Canada and the United States. We'll have an opportunity to tour and record as well."

Another Toronto appearance will be a benefit for the Canadian Friends of Ezrath Nashim – Herzog Hospital in Israel at the Toronto Centre for the Performing Arts on Sept. 19.

Tickets to the Toronto Symphony Orchestra Young People's Concert on May 27 featuring Solomon, Keira Fullerton on cello and Rosemary Thomson conducting cost $17. For showtimes and tickets call 416-593-4828.

Thought-provoking films on Vision TV

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

If you take a close look at trends in the Middle East, you'll find that religious fundamentalism is sweeping the region.

An Islamic revolution has changed the face of Iran, and in Algeria, an Islamic revolt has triggered a full-blown civil war. In Egypt and in Turkey, Islam is growing as a political force. And in Israel, Jewish – and Islamic – fundamentalism is a rising phenomenon.

With this in mind, Vision TV is broadcasting two thought-provoking documentaries on the subject next week under the broad title of Remaking the World.

The first one, This Land Is Ours, which is scheduled to air on Tuesday, May 23 at 9 p.m., focuses on the extremist wing of the Jewish settlers' movement in Israel. The second one, The Best Society On Earth, which can be seen on Thursday, May 25 at 9 p.m., examines Islamic fundamentalism in Egypt.

Although they have little in common and consider each other arch enemies, religious extremists in Israel and Egypt share at least one abiding characteristic. Both are motivated and driven by a deep-seated messianic belief in God and are absolutely convinced that they are carrying out God's commandments on earth.

This Land Is Ours refers, of course, to the West Bank, or Judea and Samaria, where thousands of settlers affiliated with

The show also incorporates the traditional significance of chai, the Hebrew letters that represent the number 18 and the word for life. The show celebrates the gallery's 18th year, and the work of 18 juried artists are on display.

In addition, A Show of Hands dedicated 18 percent of the proceeds from the opening night to the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care's art therapy program.

A touching sidelight of the exhibit is a beautiful showcase of artworks created by the members of that program.

At the reception, Steven Petroff, Sara's husband and the Gallery's marketing director, noted that the current location of the gallery used to be a bank.

Since Sara's former career was in architecture, he said, she fell in love with the site's potential, and transformed it into a place of beauty and light.

But, he pointed out, the vault is still there – it was cheaper to leave it than remove it – and they were sorely tempted to name it the OyGa Vault.

The show was juried by a panel of artistic notables, including, among others, Av Isaac, proprietor of the Isaac Inuit Gallery, and Dorion Liebgott, curator of the Judaica museum at Beth Tzedec Synagogue.

Ken Gangbar, one of the artists represented in Judaica 2000, works with contemporary designs in porcellaneous white clay, with a slight Japanese influence in his works. At the gallery his items include unique, sparse, ultra-modern seder plate sets.

"I really wanted these pieces to be shown in a gallery setting. And it was a long time since I'd produced any Judaica. For me that's a big part of the excitement, and I want to continue with that," Gangbar said.

From the cool, clean lines of Gangbar's seder set, to the intricately beaded mezuzot of Temma Gentles and Dorothy Ross, there's something to appeal to everyone's artistic sensibilities. The piece-de-resistance for many at the party, were two exquisite, hand-woven and hand-painted tallitot by Gentles, Levine Petroff and Edna Sandler.

Judaica 2000 is at A Show of Hands Gallery, 1016 Eglinton Ave. W., until May 28. For gallery hours, phone 416-782-4696.

Film should be savoured

Amid the tension, Solomon's reluctance to introduce Gaenor to his parents tears them apart. But as a miners' strike takes hold, they reunite, only to be torn from each other's grasp yet again.

As the strife at the mines mounts, Gaenor's overtly anti-Semitic brother instigates a mob to ransack Solomon's father's shop.

These events, horrible as they are, redouble Solomon's and Gaenor's burning desire to be with each other. At this point, pathos turns into tragedy as the lovers struggle to overcome overwhelming odds.

An Oscar nominee in the category of best foreign language film, Solomon and Gaenor is a fine, understated movie, an exquisite little gem which sparkles brightly in the light of self-revealment.

It is appealing in every respect, due to Morrison's disciplined direction and taut script and the performances of an exemplary cast.

A film of such stellar quality is rare, and should be savoured.

Look for an interview with director Paul Morrison in a future issue.

Thought-provoking documentaries

Gush Emunim (Bloc of the Faithful) have established facts on the ground in the form of settlements.

Although Gush Emunim has a fairly small membership, its agenda of settling the disputed territories has had an enormous impact on successive Israeli governments since its founding following the 1973 Yom Kippur War.

The film introduces us to a panoply of Gush leaders – from the fiery Daniella Weiss to the ascetic Rabbi Eliezer Waldman – and takes us to its settlements.

Weiss, an Orthodox woman, dreams of building "gigantic cities" in the West Bank, which she fervently regards as her spiritual and historical home. Israel, she proclaims, cannot give up "an inch" of territory to the Palestinians.

Rabbi Waldman claims that God brought Jews back to the West Bank, which he describes as the Jewish homeland.

Dissenting views of Gush's philosophy and objectives are presented in interviews with the haredi Rabbi Moshe Hirsch and with the Labour party politician Avraham Burg. Hirsh believes that the settlers are too impatient and should curtail their activities pending the arrival of the Messiah. Burg argues that Gush Emunim is an embodiment of a ghetto mentality.

The Best Society On Earth is a reference to the economic egalitarian Islamic state fundamentalists wish to build in Egypt, the first Arab nation to sign a peace treaty with Israel.

Believing that only the imposition of martial law keeps them from attaining power, they are certain that they will rule Egypt one day. In the meantime, they gain converts and allies with their charities and network of health and dental clinics.

The current Islamic revival in Egypt is traced to Egypt's ignominious defeat in the 1967 Six Day War. But the story really begins with the founding of the Muslim Brotherhood by Hassan al-Banna in the 1920s.

The Best Society On Earth is largely based on interviews with Islamic spokespersons from all walks of life. Among the most articulate is Adel Hussein, an Islamic publisher in Cairo who embraces modern technology to spread the faith. Like some others, he turned to Islam after the signal failure of Arab nationalism and marxism.

Toronto teen suits up with Maccabi Haifa

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Although he's just 17 years of age, Sam Hazan has already done as much globe-trotting in pursuit of his soccer career as many players twice his age.

This year, the quick-footed football phenom can be found plying his trade in Israel, playing with Maccabi Haifa's junior team. Heady company indeed, as among soccer aficionados, Maccabi Haifa is considered the Arsenal or Manchester United of Israel, the elite team that year in and year out competes for championships and wins more than its fair share of titles.

Hazan, who was born in Israel but grew up in Toronto, was recently offered a four-year contract with Maccabi Haifa but he settled on a one-year deal, said David Hazan, Sam's father.

Because he was born in Israel, signing a four-year deal could have landed him in the army instead of playing soccer, Hazan explained.

Sam came to Maccabi Haifa in October after spending much of last year trying to land a starting position on youth development teams in England and France. While living with his uncle in England, he tried out first with the Watford Soccer Club's junior team, a second division team based in London, and then spent three months working out with Arsenal's youth team. Unfortunately, Hazan could not obtain the work permit that would have permitted him to accept Arsenal's contract offer to play in the organization.

After England, Hazan tried his luck in France. For one month he "tested" with a team in Nice but Sam decided not to play for them because no Jewish billets could be found for him, his father explained.

From there it was on to Maccabi Haifa, a team with which he already had ties. Back when he was 12 and spending a vacation in the northern port city, he trained for two months with the club's youth team. At the time, the coach was so impressed with his skills, he tried to persuade the family to let Sam remain in Israel and play full time. Instead he returned to Canada and pursued his passion for soccer here.

In Toronto, Hazan continued his rapid development. When he was 15, he helped his club team, Glen Shields, win a national championship. His talents earned him an invitation to try out for the national youth team for players 16 and under. Hazan also played for the Ontario provincial team and the left wing/striker led the Toronto team at the JCC-Maccabi Youth Games-in Connecticut to a gold medal, when as a 14-year-old he scored 13 goals in five games.

Glen Shields' technical director, David Benning, last year rated Hazan among the top 10 percent of players in his age group with the potential to develop into a national player for Canada.

"He's very technical," Benning said. "He's very good with the ball. He can see the game. He has lots of vision."

Hazan's main strengths, as he described them, are his ball control and his powerful, left-footed shot. In 15 games with the Maccabi Haifa juniors, he scored six goals.

Hazan has so impressed soccer scouts in Israel that he's been invited to play for the national under-17 team. In early May, he was back in Europe, this time representing Israel in a tournament against opponents from Italy, France, Germany and England.

An abbreviated guide to Jewish history, part 2, year 1948-2170 (1812-1590 BCE)

By JORDAN MAX

Following a brief interlude for Purim and Pesach, we now continue with our Y6K Jewish history guide. I now understand that this guide may actually end up as the official full-version text of Jewish history in the new post-Zionist, Israeli education curriculum.

1948 (1812 BCE) — Avram, son of Terah and heir-apparent in the Idols R Us empire, is born. At an early age, he overhauls the product line and consolidates into one product, which he labels Monotheism. However, Terah's board of directors disagrees with the product change and turfs them both out, whereupon they relocate the business to Charan. Avram leaves the family business and goes into the soul business.

1996 (1764 BCE) — Noah's descendants decide to go into the condominium construction business. The overuse of subcontractors leads to utter confusion at the work site, construction is stalled and the lawsuits begin. People start learning other languages so they can talk about their children and associates right in front of them. Noah's descendants move to the four corners of the earth, where they can live far away from their neighbours while still being able to see what they're up to.

2018 (1742 BCE) — At age 70, Avram is told by God to get out of town and head to Canaan, giving rise to the first travel agent, tour guide books and cheap tourist trinkets. Avram shleps throughout Canaan, with a package side trip to Egypt. One night, he holds a big BBQ and signs an exclusive eternal deal with God in exchange for future considerations.

At age 99, during a mid-life crisis, he listens to God tell him to circumcise himself and his son Ishmael, and he becomes Avraham.

A year later, as predicted earlier, Avraham and his 90-year-old wife Sarah become proud parents of Isaac, proving that you can never be too old to become a parent (this message sponsored by Planned Parenthood International).

2085 (1675 BCE) — Avraham, once again listening to God, takes his favourite son, heir and caddy Isaac on the first father-son golf tournament, soon to become memorialized as the Akedat Yitzchak Invitational Classic.

On the 18th hole, Avraham, trailing by 10 strokes, takes his Ginsu knife and risks it all by attempting to sacrifice Isaac on the barbeque, but a course official orders him to desist, citing new local house rules that forbid human sacrifice of opponents, and informing him that this was only the club initiation test, hah, hah, hah.

Avraham substitutes with a sheep attached to a shofar, double-eagles the hole and finishes the round at par. Avraham and Isaac leave, resolving never to play golf again.

2108 (1652 BCE) — Isaac and his wife Rebecca give birth to twins, named Jacob and Esau, who couldn't be more different from each other. Jacob grows up to be such a nice boy, a real talmid chacham even, while Esau becomes an "outdoorsman" with his own game-hunting business. Jacob barters Esau's birthright from him for a bowl of lentil soup. Imagine what he could have gotten for a good bowl of chicken soup with knaidlach.

About Teens

Dear Karilani,

In my grade, we are expected to do many group projects, yet it is almost impossible to complete them. I am always the leader and the one who puts in the most effort. Every time my group gets together, I am always there. They refuse to get together without me, yet they skip the meeting whenever they want.

My group members get mad at me, and we constantly get into fights. We disagree when it comes to decisions and almost everything else. They never complete their assigned tasks properly, and I am the only one I can count on to get the job done right. I am so sick of hearing their excuses on why they cannot attend a meeting or do their share of the work.

Overworked

Dear Overworked,

Although group projects are challenging and at times frustrating, they are an important part of your curriculum to help students handle the types of problems that you are now facing. Group projects try to teach students how to work as a team. They involve getting along with your peers as well as sharing ideas, suggestions and the workload.

It sounds as though your group is not successfully meeting the challenges of this kind of project. But there are ways to solve some of the problems. The most important thing is to speak to the people in your group and tell them how irritated and frustrated you are. It is possible that they have no idea you are feeling this way. They may assume that you like taking all the responsibility and being in command, so let them know that you do not.

If they do not respond, then you can go speak to your teacher and let him or her know the situation. It can be in privacy; no one else has to know except you and the teacher. It is important that the teacher know the dynamics of the group, and also that you are the sole person doing the work.

If the members of your group fight with you about decisions, hear them out. They may have a good idea, and if they feel attached to an idea, it may motivate them to work harder and more diligently.

Most important, though, is to tell your group members how you feel about the unfair division of effort. They may actually listen.

Karilani is a composite name for three girls, who are close friends and in Grade 12 in Toronto.

'Confessions' mount in Iran

CJN Staff and News Services

All but one of the 10 remaining Iranian Jews in custody on charges of spying for Israel have now confessed to passing sensitive information to the Jewish state, or to "co-operating with the Zionist regime."

According to Montreal Liberal MP Irwin Cotler, who is in regular contact with Foreign Affairs Minister Lloyd Axworthy on the matter, nine of the 10 Jewish men still in custody in the southern city of Shiraz have to date confessed, leaving one who has pleaded not guilty, and three who have been free on bail but who must return to court this week.

None of the 13 has been formally charged with a crime since their incarceration in early 1999, Cotler said, adding that the nine confessions are inadmissible, even under Iranian law.

"They are illegal because they were secured in detention and without counsel present," Cotler told The CJN. "These defendants have been held incommunicado for over a year. That constitutes deprivation of liberty and thus, the confessions secured are inadmissible under international law and under Iranian law."

Immigration bill imbroglio

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — In an unlikely convergence of forces, two Jewish groups dedicated to prosecuting Nazi war criminals found themselves last week on the same side of an issue as supporters of killing squad member Helmut Oberlander.

B'nai Brith Canada and the Coalition of Concerned Congregations (CCC), an organization that represents six Montreal synagogues, called upon the House of Commons to adopt amendments to the government's proposed new Citizenship Act, Bill C-16. The amendments would give those facing loss of citizenship – and government lawyers – an extra avenue of appeal.

They were joined by the lawyer representing Oberlander, Oberlander's backers in Kitchener-Waterloo who registered their views in Internet polls, petitions and letters to the editor, as well as by Liberal MPs who view the procedure outlined in Bill C-16 as unfair.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Centre in Trouble

CALGARY — Local Jewish leaders experienced a sense of déjà vu recently when they heard that the Calgary Jewish Centre is in financial trouble and needs an immediate injection of cash if the doors are to remain open. A similar meeting was held four years ago, when the centre asked the Calgary Jewish Community Council for $325,000. This time, it is asking for a line of credit of $400,000.

Jewish Film Fest

VANCOUVER — Vancouver's 12th annual Jewish Film Festival got under way this week. The festival will showcase some two dozen films of Jewish interest and content from around the world. It continues to June 4. Some of the films will be screened in Victoria from June 11 to 18. For details, call 604-266-0245 or visit www.vjff.org

ISRAEL

Banks Open Books

JERUSALEM — Israel's banks have agreed to let an external auditor inspect their records of dormant accounts that may have belonged to Holocaust victims or their heirs. Bank Leumi has publicized a list of all accounts that were dormant since 1955, but not those that had earlier been handed over to Israel's custodian general. Bank Hapoalim, Israel's biggest bank, said it found only 170 accounts dating back to 1944 in its files, but could not locate one-third of the holders, and transferred them to the custodian as well.

Joint Airport

JERUSALEM — Israel and Jordan have agreed to build a joint airport that will begin operating in a year. The airport would serve the nearby Red Sea resorts of Eilat and Aqaba.

Most Wanted Caught?

JERUSALEM — Palestinian officials last week arrested a Hamas militant who tops Israel's most-wanted list, reported Israel Television's Channel 1. But Palestinian officials did not confirm the report on Mohammed Deif.

WORLD

Austrian Fund

VIENNA — Austria and seven other countries have agreed on the outlines of a new Austrian fund for Holocaust-era slave and forced labourers. Austria agreed to pay some $395 million to about 150,000 former slave and forced labourers. Payments would range from about $1,300 for forced labourers to about $6,800 for slave labourers. Many details of the fund still have to be negotiated. Another meeting is scheduled for May 30 in Washington.

Heroes Honoured

LODZ — A leader of the Warsaw Ghetto uprising and a World War II envoy who told the West about the Holocaust were among those named honorary citizens of the Polish city of Lodz this month. In addition to Marek Edelman and Jan Karski, film director Roman Polanski was also honoured by Lodz, where some 200,000 Jews lived before World War II.

Journalist Sentenced

BUCHAREST — A Romanian journalist accused of writing anti-Semitic articles has received a two-year suspended prison sentence. A Bucharest court ruled that Mihai Bogdan Antonescu, 35, had written anti-Semitic newspaper articles in 1997 and 1998. One of them called members of the government "dirty Jews" and Gypsies.

Gays Lose Case

NEW YORK — Gay and lesbian students have lost their attempt to appeal a dismissal of their lawsuit against Yeshiva University's medical school over its ban on same-sex couples living in its married-student housing. In 1999, a New York court ruled that the university was not responsible for gay and lesbian students' inability to marry.

Swiss Add to Fund

BERNE — Several Swiss insurers have agreed to pay $50 million to settle Holocaust-era claims, Reuters reported last week. The money will be added to a $1.25-billion out-of-court settlement Swiss banks agreed to pay in 1998, the sources said.

Prison Anti-Semitic?

SAN FRANCISCO — A prison guard is charging the state's department of corrections with anti-Semitism. Alan Ashenfarb, who has worked at San Quentin since 1994, claims that he has suffered emotional distress from anti-Semitic jokes and comments made by other employees and prison administrators.

Program for Young Jewish Leaders

Israel's Foreign Ministry is holding its second annual Young Jewish Leadership Diplomatic Seminar.

The seminar was first run last July with 35 participants from 16 countries around the world. This year's seminar is scheduled for July 23 to Aug. 11.

The program's foremost objective is to enhance the relationship between young Jewish leaders and the State of Israel. The seminar will explore many facets of the Israeli agenda, including the peace process, national security, the economy, culture and society, and Jewish life in Israel.

The program is conducted under the auspices of Bayit Meshutaf (Shared Home), a new division of the Foreign Affairs Ministry that seeks to strengthen young Jewish leaders' ties to Israel and the Jewish world. The ministry covers full board and lodging, excursions and other costs. Participants are responsible for covering their flight costs to and from Israel.

Applicants must be university graduates and no older than 35. The operative language of the seminar is English.

For further information and an application, please contact David Cooper at the Israeli Embassy in Ottawa, Lisa Armony at the consulate in Toronto, or Barnea Hassid at the consulate in Montreal. Application deadline is June 1.

Chaplain helps build bridges to the Jewish community

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — From the moment the steel door clangs shut behind you, you know you're in a place apart. With barbed wire on the fences outside, security guards at entranceways and the "guests" dressed in readily distinguishable orange jump suits, it's clear this isn't the Hilton. More like the Crowbar Hotel, where the guests check in and never leave until their host, the Ontario legal system, says it's time to go.

Special Feature
Jews in prison

There's something permanent and ominous about the clang of the electric door. For Rabbi Ronald Weiss, who's been visiting the Metro East Detention Centre for six years, the slamming of the door reminds him of how good life is on the outside.

"It's one thing to hear them clang if you're here for one hour. It's another if you're here for a longer period," he said.

Rabbi Weiss is a regular visitor at Metro East, as he is at two dozen other detention centres, jails and penitentiaries across Ontario. As director of chaplaincy services for Jewish Family & Child Service, a UJA FEDERATION-funded agency, it's his job to bring comfort, solace and a friendly face to the dozens of Jews who are guests at Her Majesty's Crowbar Hotels at any one time.

On this visit to Metro East, shortly before Pesach, Rabbi Weiss has with him matzahs and macaroons to help the inmates mark the holiday. He also has grape juice in glass bottles, but they will never leave his van. Rev. Mike Peacefull, the head chaplain at the facility, tells Rabbi Weiss that glass bottles can be broken and used as a weapon.

One thing the inmates do not lack is imagination, at least when it comes to creating weapons from everyday items. Even a pen, in the prison context, can be as mighty as a sword. These are not the nicest guys, I'm reminded, even though they're in a detention centre, not a correctional institution. For the uninitiated, a detention centre is where suspects are held pending trial. Correctional institutions, a.k.a. prisons, are where they go should they be convicted.

The sheltering canopy

Excerpts of an address by the editor on accepting the Founding Friend of Campus Award bestowed upon The Canadian Jewish News by Jewish Campus Services of Greater Toronto:

From the editor's desk

I understand the purpose of this award is, in essence, a way of saying thank you to the paper for providing regular news coverage of student life on campus, for trying to shine a continuous spotlight of sorts on the many interesting and important things students are doing on their respective campuses, primarily, but not only, in Toronto.

I am delighted to accept this marvellous expression of thanks for The CJN; but there is an enormous irony in my doing so. For, carrying news of campus life in the paper is, of itself, a way for us to express our thanks to the people who make JCS possible – the lay people, the funders at UJA FEDERATION, the philanthropists, the students who attend JCS activities and more particularly, the dozen or so unsung heroes of Jewish Campus Services under the leadership of Zac Kaye – who have helped to revive student life on campus to the point, now, that there is something on a regular basis for us to cover, who, for the first time in many years, have helped bring back, closer to centre stage, the great diversity of student life, so that the spotlight that we try to shine through the pages of our newspaper can easily find them.

And why is it important that we, the newspaper and the community whose voice we try to embody, express our thanks to you, the unsung dozen heroes of JCS?

The students who hang out, or upside down, or even inside out at JCS – and at all the "JCSs" across North America – are our children: in some cases literally, but in all cases, metaphorically.

They come to you, their paths cross yours, at a time in their lives of sweeping transition, of rapid personal change, sometimes of turbulence, but never, ever of stasis, of status quo.

Stepping onto unfamiliar campus grounds, our children encounter myriad new faces, new ideas, new and competing ways of life, new and conflicting values. They have so many new forces and pressures to contend with: social demands, academic demands and perhaps the most difficult, the self-demands of finding personal and ideological certainties where so few certainties exist.

New friendships form. Students from the suburbs meet students from downtown who meet students from out-of-town who meet students from out of province who meet students from out-of-country.

In the process, of course, some old friendships drift, are neglected and become the reason for a new source of anxiety.

This is a time in our children's lives when they are seeking new truths and questioning old ones, a time of discovery and of idealism, of believing in oneself, in one's causes, never afraid to try, never afraid of the possibility of failure.

It is a time of life for finding out who they are, who they could yet be.

And as they seek, some become lost; most, thankfully, find themselves.

We – as their parents – hope with all our hearts that when that search begins, when our children step onto unfamiliar campus grounds, they will at least be able to walk securely within their Judaism.

Of course, walking securely within their Judaism does not mean walking complacently, or even comfortably, because to be Jewish is to be constantly "struggling" with one's faith, in the sense that Jacob struggled with the angel.

But JCS provides the milieu, the framework, the activities, the companionship, the understanding heart, the comforting hand, "the positive Jewish space" to help our children in their struggles to find out who and what they are.

JCS is the sheltering canopy of Jewish life on campus, yet one through which some of our children might begin to see, when they look up, heavenward, towards their own and their people's destiny, the overwhelmingly rich, positive, inspiring constellation of Jewish values.

In later years, looking back – as say, a 50-year-old editor might – we wanted to change the world and we believed that we could change at least part of it, because wanting to change the world was among the most important things one could do.

Not until many years later – say, as a 50-year-old editor – did we understand that each day we do change part of the world when we embrace the values of kindness and goodness and social justice and fairness, the values and traditions of our ancestors, of our people. And we know this is not always an easy or an assured embrace…

As our sages have taught from the very first days in which they began teaching, each life is a universe unto itself. When we give of ourselves, when we try to ease the other's burdens, the unique and distinct world of a fellow human being, we are in fact changing the world – though it seldom, if ever, gets into the news, let alone makes the headlines.

By being the "positive Jewish space" on campus, how many unique and distinct worlds has JCS and its dozen or so unsung heroes helped to change?

And that brings me back to the irony of The CJN's being thanked by JCS. In truth, we are simply the mirror trying to reflect back towards the community the light you bring into so many lives and which, in some cases, will shine for a very long time.

Ont. government's social policy record slammed

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It is shameful for Premier Mike Harris to send $200 cheques to Ontario taxpayers when there are homeless people living on Toronto streets, says a downtown Toronto lawyer.

The money should go towards supporting shelters and creating opportunities that could return some self-esteem to these people, Steven Gray said at the second part of a two-part panel discussion sponsored by Ve'ahavta: The Canadian Jewish Humanitarian Relief Committee and The Native Men's Residence, in conjunction with Caldwell Securities.

Other panel members included Ron Cooper, a former crack cocaine addict who was once homeless; John Stackhouse, a Toronto journalist; and Gordon Wolfe, executive director of Jewish Family & Child Service.

"I would be comforted to know that I have helped provide food and beds, and I would [gladly] support food and clothing banks. There are ways to help without giving coins," said Gray.

Homeless people do not only include those living on the streets, said Wolfe. They also include people in hospitals, jails or treatment centres who have no place to go when they are released and no wherewithal to find a place; people staying with friends on an emergency basis; children living in foster care; those living temporarily in single occupancy hotel rooms; and people who cannot afford suitable housing, he said.

"It is important not to zero in on the beggar on the street," he said.

Wolfe has "grave concerns" about child poverty, and noted that on any given night in Toronto, there are about 1,600 people staying in shelters, and of that number, 1,000 are children. "Of the 100,000 people on the waiting list for public housing, 40,000 are children.

"There is mounting evidence about what happens when we do not take care of our kids. The long term results are disastrous."

Homelessness is only a symptom of what is going on, said Wolfe. "People cannot afford housing. Rents are rising, there is little vacancy, and there is no government money for social housing. There is a link between social policy and homelessness.

"In good Jewish tradition I give to the beggar, and I fight to improve what is causing [people to beg], he said.

Stackhouse, who lived on the streets for seven days and nights, and later wrote about it in the Globe and Mail, said that the question of whether to give money to a beggar is "an eternal one that has no answer."

Do more than give money to beggars: panel

In one 10-hour period of begging on the streets, he said, he was able to collect $223. "It was two weeks before Christmas, so people might have felt generous, but I was told that it is common to be able to earn about $100 in one day.

"It is important to understand that people have the potential to earn a lot of money. The loonie and the toonie changed the economics of begging."

His greatest concern about giving to beggars, said Stackhouse, is that it might make people think they are doing enough. "We need to invest more directly in the poor."

Cooper said the bottom line about giving money to people on the street, is that the more money that goes out, the more people are saved. "It is true that money is often spent on drugs and alcohol, but it is also spent on food, transportation and lodging. We can't base our decision on whether to give money or not, on what we think people might do with it."

Cooper, in recovery for over three years, said that at the height of his addiction, $50 worth of crack cocaine would not have lasted half an hour.

"I never begged on the streets. However, I discovered that shelter, food and support is available if you look for it. There are food and clothing banks, and places such as NaMeRes. I felt that I did not have to be on the streets. I wanted to direct my asking to social service workers.

"My experience is that social service workers bend over backwards to help people who are willing to help themselves."

There is so much more we can do than flip a beggar a coin, he said. "You can give him moral support, ask how he is doing, or bring him food or a bus token. Letting them know you care makes a big difference.

"It is important for everyone to raise their awareness, and get to the point where they are comfortable about dealing with people on the streets," said Cooper.

People should also volunteer their time, their vehicle, or help out in their area of expertise, said Cooper. "Ask yourself every day, what you have done to help out someone in need."

Government policy does need to be changed, he said, but we must accept that we are only in year two of a five-year government mandate, and "this government is not going to change. It is up to us to do something, and work to get this government out in the next election."

Israel's Supreme Court's importance explored

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Israel's Supreme Court has become a drafter of important public policy, a New Israel Fund forum has been told.

In recent years, the court has handed down a series of landmark decisions and thus exerted considerable influence on Israel, two University of Toronto professors said in a review of the court's verdicts.

The speakers were Ran Hirschl, a political science professor who is finishing a book on the political origins and consequences of judicial empowerment through the constitutionalization of rights, and Ayelet Shachar, a law professor who served as Israeli Chief Justice Aharon Barak's law clerk.

The topic of their presentations was The Changing Role of the Israeli Supreme Court in Shaping the Multicultural Face of Israeli Society.

Defining itself by its judicial activism, Israel's high court has ruled on wide-ranging matters such as religious pluralism, gender equality, the status of Israeli Arabs, sexual preference, and the practice of Israel's internal security service, Shin Bet, Hirschl observed.

He cited several cases:

• The 1992 Kastenbaum case, in which a woman was allowed to engrave the dates of her mother's birth and death on her tombstone in Roman rather than in Hebrew letters.

• The 1996 Meretz movement vs. the municipality of Jerusalem case, in which national religious councils were ordered to include representatives of Reform and Conservative Judaism.

• The 2000 Katzir case, in which a Jews-only communal settlement in the Galilee was ordered to allow an Israeli Arab family to buy a house there.

Shachar referred to other path-breaking cases:

• The 1995 Danilowitch case, in which the court held that El Al, the national airline, should provide the partner of a homosexual employee with the same benefits as the spouses of heterosexual workers.

• The 1999 Galili case, in which the court blocked the promotion of a senior army officer who had been involved in a consensual sexual relationship with a female soldier under his command.

In a brief survey of Israel's British-based legal system, Hirschl said that its 11 basic laws fulfil the function of a bill of rights.

He added that all attempts to draft a formal bill of rights have failed so far.

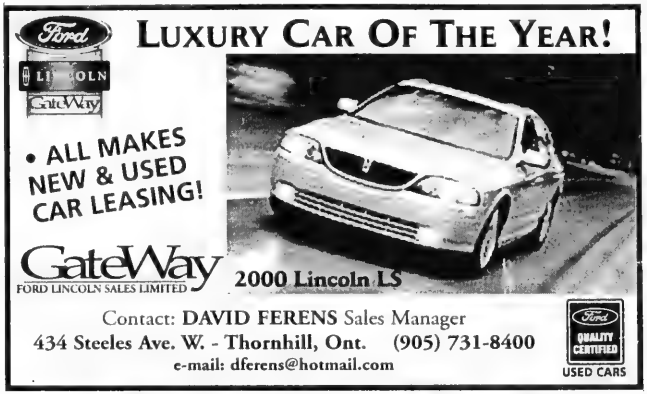
David Ben-Gurion, the first prime minister, saw no need for one in a free, democratic state, saying that a bill of duties was instead required.

Israel's religious parties, as well as its secular elite, have both opposed a bill of rights, Hirschl said.

Shachar noted that well organized minorities, such as same-sex couples and Israeli Arabs, have benefited from the court's judicial activism.

Ed Morgan, a U of T law professor and Canadian Jewish Congress' national counsel, said that the jurisprudence of the Israeli Supreme Court has been complicated because of the complex nature of Israeli society.

He also talked about court decisions in Canada and the United States which have fostered tolerance and multiculturalism.



Aish HaTorah marks 18th anniversary

TORONTO — Aish HaTorah, an international Jewish educational outreach organization, is celebrating its 18th anniversary in Toronto with a gala evening.

The event will be held June 6, 8:15 p.m., at the Sheraton Centre. The guest speaker will be Malcolm Hoenlein, executive vice-chair of the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations.

Honourees will be Toronto Aish HaTorah founders Herb and Joyce Green, and the founding rabbinic families, Shalom and Debbie Schwartz, Moshe Averick, Ahron and Faigy Hoch, Mitch and Leora Mandel, and Boruch and Dena Rabinowitz.

A formal farewell will be said to Rabbi Yaakov and Lori Palatnik, who will be moving from the Village Shul on Eglinton Avenue to start an Aish HaTorah in Boca Raton, Fla.

The organization founded in 1974 now operates in 77 cities in 17 countries, including 20 centres in the former Soviet Union. Its Israel headquarters overlooks the Kotel.

In Toronto, the main centre is on Clark Avenue just west of Bathurst in Thornhill. There are also programs at the Village Shul, and Shabbat and holiday programs at Westmount Collegiate in Thornhill.

All in a week's work

Last week was a difficult one for Israel. On a number of fronts, military events collided with political ones. In each instance, the government responded quickly and decisively, although not always with wide popular support, leaving many observers with a growing sense that some of the traditional Middle East antagonists, Israel and the Palestinian Authority, at least, might have turned the corner and are headed, perhaps, towards some kind of negotiating "finishing line."

Nakba: Last Monday, Palestinians in the West Bank and Gaza poured onto the streets in a prepared, controlled, orchestrated program of rioting. They were marking what they have in recent times started to call the nakba, meaning disaster, the anniversary of the creation of the State of Israel on May 15, 52 years ago. After the protests, five Palestinians lay dead on the dusty, rock and rubble-strewn streets, human sacrifices to the cynical, cruel political gamesmanship of the PA leadership.

The IDF found itself under siege of live ammunition as well as of the image-conscious, photo-oriented volley of stones and slingshots. IDF chief of staff Shaul Mofaz and IDF central commander Maj. Gen. Moshe Ya'alon praised the army's swift, measured response to the murderous drama that was staged for the western world but in which they were unwilling players.

Abu Dis: While the Palestinians were hurling rocks and firing their weapons, the Knesset voted 56-48 to return Abu Dis, the village on the eastern outskirts of Jerusalem, along with two other villages, Assariyeh and Suwahara, to full Palestinian control. Abu Dis is widely thought to be where the Palestinians are building their parliament. As a result of the Knesset's decision, the NRP left the governing coalition.

Lebanon: The IDF began its withdrawal from south Lebanon under a hail of Hezbollah rockets and fire. Three IDF soldiers were injured. Hezbollah vowed to keep up its actions against Israel even though Israel is leaving Lebanese territory.

Stockholm: While all the above was going on, representatives of Israel and the PA were in Stockholm conducting what were euphemistically called "back-channel discussions" over the shape of a possible final peace agreement. Ehud Barak and Yasser Arafat felt they had to send their representative out of the region to protect the secrecy of the discussions from the intruding, often overbearing curiosity of the media. By early week, however, the meetings in Stockholm were no longer a secret; the chief non-back-channel Palestinian negotiator had resigned for having not been informed of the Stockholm meetings; many of the reported details of the discussions were published in European and Israeli newspapers; and the government of Israel once again seemed hovering on the brink of collapse.

It was all in a week's work for the government of Israel.

Jews as trade bait

Those Jewish Iranian "confessions" (CJN, May 11) probably have little to do with their guilt or with infighting between progressive and conservative Iranian mullahs. Rather, this sets them up as Israeli spies to be traded at some future date for the Hezbollah sheiks sitting in Israeli jails.

Had these sheiks been released in the recent release of Lebanese prisoners, the "Jewish spies" would probably have been set free or given short sentences. Instead, some of them can expect to stay in jail at least until Israel acts on the sheiks.

As in the past, the enemies of Israel consider all Jews to be targets.

Let's expose another misconception

I was sardonically interested in your recent expose of the over-vaunted Dutch record during the Nazi occupation. To this day, they ride on the back of Anne Frank, and latterly, of Charlotte Salomon.

Of course they were not alone. We live in the age of hollow expiation and breast-beating. Misconceptions come tumbling down one after another.

Next on the laundry list should be an account of the German occupation of the (British) Channel Islands, where the Nazis enjoyed a no less hearty welcome extending even to the postwar years.

Seeking Jewish conscience

Where is the outrage of Canada's Jews? In the 1930s, the Liberal government of Canada refused landing to Jewish refugees fleeing a brutal totalitarian regime in Germany. Today, we have a Jewish Liberal immigration minister proudly announcing that Chinese refugees fleeing a brutal totalitarian regime in China will be deported to a place where they will surely be imprisoned in concentration camps or worse.

Have Canada's Jews lost all sense of history and integrity? I ask again, where is the outrage?

Sinners stopped sinning at Sinai

There are certain inaccuracies in Jean Gerber's May 4 column, "Who stood at Sinai," that should not be overlooked or ignored. Her thesis is based on poems by Danny Seigel. The thesis is that every kind of Jew, from good to bad, from religious to atheist, and from saint to sinner, was present at Mount Sinai when Moses brought down the Ten Commandments and the written and oral Torah from God.

Gerber sounds confused because she refers to her thesis as "an overpowering midrash," which it is not. Our Torah sages teach, she correctly reports, that the entire nation gathered to hear the Divine voice. However, she fails to add that a definition of "the entire nation" must include the following:

- About 80 percent of the Jews who were slaves in Egypt chose not to follow Moses into the wilderness. They died in Egypt, along with the Egyptians. One of the many reasons that so many Israelis refused to leave Egypt was that they did not want to give up the licentious and immoral lifestyles they had learned and copied from their masters.
- After God's Torah had been given to our people, the penalties against those who violated its laws were put into effect. One Israelite, the Torah teaches, who decided to gather wood on Shabbat, was put to death.
- Dathan, the jealous antagonist of Moses, was publicly swallowed up by the earth, along with all of his followers, for distorting the teachings of the Torah. One midrash teaches that Dathan did not die, but that he could forever be heard crying from the depths of the earth that "Moses is right, Moses is right."
- The Torah also teaches us that when Pinchas found Zimri and Cosbi publicly engaged in an immoral act, he ran them both through with a spear and was rewarded by God for protecting Torah laws.

The Torah teaches that when the entire nation accepted the Torah, they all said, "We will do and we will hear." Probably, as Gerber suggests, homosexuals and transvestites of both sexes did stand at Sinai, along with many other sinners. Since the entire nation accepted the entire Torah, the sinners accepted it too, and they either changed their ways, or they perished.

Palestinians themselves morally responsible

By A. B. YEHOSHUA
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

On Nov. 29, 1947, the UN General Assembly approved a resolution to partition the land of Israel into two states, Palestinian and Israeli, with the territory equally divided between the two.

The Jewish population, which then numbered about 600,000 – as opposed to about 1.3 million Palestinians – was allotted large swaths of the barren desert as a land reserve for the absorption of the numerous Jewish refugees waiting at the gates. While the Palestinian population was expected to grow through natural means, Israel, according to the international community that authorized the establishment of the Jewish state, was to devote itself to finding a solution to the Jewish problem, taking in Jews of all nationalities, particularly Holocaust refugees.

So despite the difference in their numbers, the land was almost equally divided between the two peoples, with more than 70 percent of the fertile land allocated to the Palestinians.

When the Palestinians failed in their war of aggression to wipe out the Jewish state, they called on the Arab armies to invade the Jewish state and eliminate it. Yet this move, too, was unsuccessful. The Jews heroically defended their territory, repulsed the invaders, and in certain places conquered areas that had been slated for the Palestinian state. (The Jewish state acquired about 6,000 square kilometres of the territory designated for the Palestinian state.) In the heat of battle, a Jewish minority was expelled from the few settlements that Palestinians occupied, as were many Palestinians from Jewish settlements.

In the final stages of the fighting, Palestinian areas were intentionally destroyed by the Israeli army and, with no military justification, their inhabitants were expelled by force to beyond the armistice line that was marked at the war's end in 1949.

Those who fled, and those who were expelled, both Jews and Palestinians, cannot accurately be called refugees, but rather displaced persons, for there is an essential difference between the two terms. A refugee is a person who has fled or been expelled from the land of his birth; a displaced person is someone who has fled or been expelled from his home, but remains within the bounds of the territory of his homeland.

The Jews who fled or were expelled by Arabs from the Old City of Jerusalem, the Etzion Bloc, Atarot, Kfar Darom or Beit Ha 'arava, into Israeli territory, were never refugees, but only displaced persons, who were immediately allocated new homes in the Israeli homeland.

However, the Palestinians did not call their uprooted people displaced persons. They were instead referred to as refugees, even though most remained in the Palestinian homeland and lived at most only 20 to 40 kilometres away from their homes. For example, the Arabs of Lod and Ramla moved to the Ramallah area, which is 30 or 40 kilometres away from these towns.

There were also Palestinians who fled or were expelled from Palestine and went to Arab countries: Egypt, Syria, Lebanon and Jordan. All of these refugees could have returned at least to their homeland, becoming displaced persons rather than refugees, and building themselves new homes in their homeland.

This is the beginning of the tragedy of the Palestinians, for which they themselves and the Arab countries carry direct moral responsibility.

Even if (from their point of view) they did have a legitimate hope that they would see the day when they would be able to eliminate the Jewish state and take back all of Palestine – or at least return to their homes just as the displaced persons from the Etzion Bloc and the Old City did – there was still nothing to prevent the Palestinian displaced persons from building real homes. They could have lived ordinary, respectable lives within their homeland, instead of a humiliating provisional existence in miserable camps.

The Palestinians, who formulated their national identity toward the end of the 19th century, to this very day confuse the concept of homeland with the concept of home. They are not the only ones. There are Israelis on the right and on the left, but particularly on the right, who are trying to depict the return of the Palestinians as a return to their homes, and not to their homeland – which would dangle a sword over the State of Israel, as if every return implied the inundation of the state with another three million Palestinians.

Such Israelis are merely perpetuating this confusion. When, at the beginning of World War II, the Soviet Union conquered parts of Finland in an aggressive and unjust war, took over land and settlements and exiled Finnish citizens westward into the Finnish state, those Finns were not refugees, but rather displaced persons. They immediately built new homes for themselves in their homeland, whatever their dreams of "return" might have been.

Of course the dream of return that the Palestinian displaced persons and refugees nurtured in their hearts had no connection at all to a political solution, or to the fact that they had embarked on an aggressive war against the Jews. For many years, they continued to reject the principle of the solution of the partition of the land, and until the Palestinian Liberation Organization decision of 1988, many did not recognize Israel.

In the meantime, however, they wanted to go home, literally. Accordingly, they sentenced themselves to lives of humiliation and poverty – a welfare existence without any basic rights.

The Palestinian refugees in Syria, Lebanon and Egypt were not even granted citizenship, in order not to detract from their clamour to return. But there is no returning home for the displaced persons and refugees of 1948, and there cannot be such a return. There can only be a return to the homeland, and sometimes this may be truly possible.

When my Palestinian friends demand the right of return, I tell them that I would be prepared to bring all the Palestinian refugees back to their homes in Israel on condition that they first bring back to life the 6,000 Israeli dead. They were killed during the aggressive war of 1948, when Israel was pleading for its life after the UN partition plan and seeking peaceful coexistence.

Against the Palestinians' continuing confusion between home and homeland stands a nation that bears within it a near-opposite distortion. Throughout history, the Jews never ceased to wander among different homes and change their homelands the way most people change their clothes.

From the time of the destruction of the First Temple, when many of the Babylonian exiles did not return to the land, the Jews began to adopt an approach that sees the world as a hotel chain. Instead of returning to the homeland in the land of Israel and clinging to it, the Jews, for existential or economic reasons, preferred to seek a new and more comfortable place for themselves, where they could settle easily. Therefore it is no wonder that the Jews scorned and alienated themselves from the sense of the real homeland (not home) of the Palestinians, and proposed that they settle in the Arab countries, as if it were really so easy to exchange a homeland for some place else.

Borders must be drawn to separate the states, as has always been done. What is defined as the Palestinian state must be recognized when the time comes as the homeland to which, and only to which, all those defined as Palestinians by the Palestinian constitution will be allowed to return. The Arab states are just as responsible for the perpetuation of the refugee problem as Israel was when it was sovereign in the territory – from the Six-Day War until the Oslo agreements.

Everyone, including the Palestinians, must begin to solve the problem. First, the problems of the uprooted Palestinians living within the boundaries of the future Palestinian state must be addressed. After that, construction must get under way on an infrastructure to address the problems of the refugees now in the Arab states.

This is a very lengthy, expensive process, that must be undertaken thoughtfully. However, it will certainly find great support, both in Israel and abroad, if this becomes the aim of worldwide fund-raising.

Report from Stockholm

Some months ago, a fascinating convention took place in Stockholm, Sweden, which was attended by 45 heads of states and concerned itself significantly with the Holocaust. Nate Leipciger, chair of the Holocaust committee of the Canadian Jewish Congress, was present, and the following is an excerpt from his report.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

"Fifty-five years after my liberation, I was sitting in an assembly of 46 nations and each head of state praised the survivors. Fifty-five years ago, most of these same nations denied us the most basic human rights, dignity, and life itself. Even after the war, we had to languish in DP camps for three long years.

"Today, nation after nation is declaring its readiness to remember. But it is not enough to remember how we were persecuted and murdered, it is equally important to remember how we lived. For this reason we must insist that the Holocaust studies must also include the identity of the victims and what type of life they had. We must make sure that the world understands that their aspirations and their hopes for their children were not unlike ours. The task force of the International Forum on the Holocaust recognizes this need. In its declaration, it calls on all nations to commit themselves to promote all aspects of Holocaust education in schools, universities, in communities and religious institutions.

"However, my elation was short-lived when I realized that the Canadian delegation did not and would not participate in the proceedings. Next morning we had a meeting of the Canadian delegation at the Canadian Embassy. Moshe Ronen, Irwin Cotler and myself expressed our disappointment at the non-participation by a Canadian delegate at the forum.

"This sad fact reminded me that our job is not finished. The Jewish community must become more active and bullish to demand that Canada join the other nations in their resolve to pursue Holocaust education on a national scale. Since education is a provincial prerogative, the creation of a national Holocaust museum in Ottawa would give the federal government of Canada a vehicle to transmit the vital messages to our young people without interfering with the provincial jurisdiction.

"The Holocaust museum would also allow it to mount travelling exhibitions and educational symposiums throughout the country. How else can Canada effectively reach our youth to teach and include the message that the democratic values which we cherish so much and which are so delicate, are in constant danger from sinister forces that wish to eliminate these in order to spread their hatred and to promote xenophobia and racism?"

Holocaust education that reaches even one courageous man can make a tremendous difference on the outcome of history, and can save thousands of lives, as illustrated by Canada's only honorary citizen, Raoul Wallenberg.

Israel's divisive draft policy

What a difference a year makes, especially in an action-packed country like Israel. Exactly 12 months ago, much of the nation happily awaited the changes expected after Ehud Barak was elected prime minister on May 17,1999. His resounding defeat of Benjamin Netanyahu was supposed to usher in a new era.

Robert Sarner in Jerusalem

During his election campaign, Barak promised major improvements to Israeli society. For example, he constantly repeated the slogan "one people, one draft," calling for an end to the injustice of the blanket exemption of haredi youth from conscription. As leader of the opposition, Barak had championed the issue, decrying the inequality in the draft system.

As a former IDF chief of staff, Barak was particularly sensitive to a divisive policy under which non-haredi young men are required to risk their lives in defence of the country, while their haredi counterparts are free to study comfortably in yeshivas and at the public's expense.

Upon taking office, Barak's campaign promise quickly faded under the weight of coalition dynamics and other political considerations. The former battlefield hero followed the tradition of politicians everywhere faced with awkward problems: set up a commission.

In this case, Barak appointed a nine-member committee headed by retired Supreme Court Justice Zvi Tal to study the problem.

A few weeks ago, the Tal Commission presented its much anticipated official recommendations to Barak. It was not a pretty sight for those hoping the long-festering issue would be finally resolved in the name of fairness.

To the disillusionment of many, the report virtually rewards draft evaders.

Until now, haredi youth could avoid national service by studying in yeshivas until age 40 without being able to leave to work and earn a living. But the report recommends that yeshiva students now be able to choose between two options following only five years of seminary study – either a brief symbolic army duty or civilian service in the haredi community. Then they'll be eligible for the same benefits offered those who spend three years in the army, such as subsidized housing loans, grants for university studies and more.

The commission fooled no one, and angered many. "The worst aspect of the commission," Reuven Hammer, vice-president of the International Rabbinical Assembly, wrote in The Jerusalem Post, "is that it seems to justify the shirking of army duty by yeshiva students and to accept their claim that their studies are as important to the nation as the active, dangerous service of millions of our sons and daughters. Surely by now everyone is aware that there is no justification for yeshiva students not serving, neither moral nor halachic."

Indeed, the army already is home to three companies of haredi soldiers who share in the national burden of military service without violating their haredi ways. "They contribute to security," IDF Chief of Staff Shaul Mofaz told reporters this month. "They are replacing reservists patrolling the border while we give them all the conditions and let them live their way of life."

Lamentably, these haredi soldiers are the exception, extremely marginal compared to the tens of thousands in their community evading army service.

Barak has not officially responded to the Tal Commission as he reportedly is still not finished studying its recommendations. Others have, including Yoel Marcus who wrote in Ha'aretz: "What is especially outrageous is the commission's rationale that draft by coercion under the law will intensify the rift in the nation." Really? People might get the idea that secular kids go off to the army with gladness and joy and not by force of law. University studies are no less important than yeshiva studies. And if the commission's discriminatory recommendations are adopted, anyone who does national service will be a patsy.

It's not hard to understand why one of the most popular planks in Barak's 1999 election campaign was the conscription of yeshiva students. More difficult to figure out is why the country's non-haredi majority has tolerated such a patently unjust situation for so long, much to its own detriment. The biggest question is whether the prime minister will finally do something about it. Just like he promised.

Barak's uninspiring year

Approaching the end of his first year as prime minister, Ehud Barak's ratings are mediocre, at best. He has avoided major mistakes, but has few significant accomplishments. Public opinion polls show a steady decline in support, to the point where almost half of the respondents claim that if elections were held now, they would vote for Netanyahu.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

Since his electoral triumph last May, Barak has focused most of his attention on foreign policy and the peace process. His proclaimed goal was to "end the Arab-Israeli conflict," based on breakthrough agreements with the Palestinians and with Syria, as well as joint projects with the other countries in the region. While Barak went as far (or farther) than any Israeli political leader could go in making concessions, particularly towards Damascus, Hafez al-Assad did not co-operate. The negotiations with the Palestinians continue, but the chances for an agreement, on terms that the Israeli public can accept, remain low.

At the same time, Barak's efforts to strengthen ties with the United States government have stalled. In the first few months, Bill Clinton and Barak put on a strong performance, ending the era of tension that had characterized the Netanyahu era. Officials in Washington spoke of a new level of strategic co-operation, as part of the compensation package in exchange for Israeli withdrawal from the Golan.

However, the Americans could not deliver Assad, while Barak failed to develop a relationship with the Republican-led Congress. When differences over Israeli arms sales to China arose, catching Barak and his advisers by surprise, (despite repeated warnings), the Americans changed their tune with leaks alleging Israeli spying activities in Washington, and reports of other misdeeds.

Relations may be somewhat better than they were under Netanyahu, but the great expectations have vanished.

On Lebanon, Barak has done better, but the real test is ahead. To his credit, he has held firmly to his pledge to withdraw, even when talks with Syria failed. Strategically, unilateral withdrawal may turn out to be a brilliant move, or it may be a disaster. If Hezbollah and its backers are deterred from attacking northern Israel, Barak's ratings will soar.

However, if the IDF's withdrawal is followed by extensive terror attacks, Barak will be forced to retaliate, international condemnation will follow, and the cost will be substantial.

In terms of domestic policy, Barak has even less to show. The economy is improving slowly, but campaign pledges on unemployment, poverty, and a new social contract remain unfulfilled. Barak invests very little time on these issues, and refuses to delegate power to anyone else. Tax reform could be an important long-term achievement, but Barak has not created enough public and political support to overcome the opposition of the powerful unions.

Similarly, Barak has done little or nothing to narrow the social and ideological divisions that threaten Israel's future. He has not exacerbated them, and this is an improvement over Netanyahu, but passivity is insufficient.

And yet, despite his poor record, Barak does not face any serious challengers. Support for Netanyahu in the polls is more of a protest than an indication of a possible comeback. Ariel Sharon is too old and discredited to become prime minister, and the younger Likud leaders lack experience. Similarly, among the current crop of Labour party politicians, none have the stature of gravitas to be prime minister. Thus, if elections were held again, very little would change.

As a result, excluding disaster, Barak still has at least three more years in which to make his mark, and probably as many as seven years. Although the first year has not provided signs of the type of bold and unifying leadership that Israel needs, Barak still has time to learn on the job.

However, this will require some fundamental changes, both in terms of personality and in the substance of policy.

The Kirshner File

A 'general' in Canada's newspaper war

"We're having a good war," chuckled Edward Greenspon. He was chatting about Canada's thunderous newspaper "war," which broke out in Toronto and the rest of the country about a year ago. The old-fashioned, rip-snorting war pits The Globe and Mail, Canada's self-styled national daily, against the National Post, media mogul Conrad Black's cheeky upstart.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Greenspon, the Globe's executive editor since 1999, is a member of the triumvirate of "generals" plotting the raging battle. Along with editor Richard Addis and deputy editor Chrystia Freeland, he has devised the strategic initiatives that, he hopes, will win the hearts and minds of readers and advertisers alike.

"We're doing spectacularly well," claimed Greenspon, whose paper won four National Newspaper Awards last week.

By his estimation, the Globe has grown fatter and better since the launch of the National Post in the autumn of 1998. "We've put a lot of effort into improving the paper," said Greenspon, a 43-year-old graduate of Montreal's Wagar High School.

The news "hole" is bigger. The number and variety of feature stories are greater. The commentary section has been beefed up. And, buoyed by a robust economy, circulation and ad lineage are up, as are profits.

Far from badmouthing his rival, Greenspon, who joined the Globe in 1986 as a business reporter, appears to welcome the new kid on the block. "Competition is good for readers. We're both trying to cover and reflect Canada. It's good that there are other newspapers out there."

In line with its strategy to outmanoeuvre the National Post, the Globe, with Greenspon at the helm, is launching what he describes as "a real-time breaking news service" on the Internet. The service, to be staffed by more than 10 additional reporters and copy editors, will essentially be a grander version of the Globe's existing Web site. Scheduled to come online in June, it will accentuate business and political news at first, and will be broadened in September.

"In Canada, this kind of service is really just getting started," said Greenspon, who visited the offices of the New York Times, the Washington Post and the Wall Street Journal to acquaint himself with the futuristic world of the Web.

As he tells it, the service is attuned to news addicts, "the community of the curious." If Greenspon's plans pan out, he will provide readers with "the straight goods on a more timely basis."

Normally in charge of the Globe's front section, Greenspon hardly regards his latest assignment as a permanent one. Yet he is excited by the prospect of reinventing himself as a "Web guy." As he put it: "What interested me was the intellectual challenge of this new medium." Indeed, he likens the Web in its current form to television's formative years.

Greenspon, who originally thought he would be a lawyer, was raised in the Montreal suburbs of St. Laurent and Cote St. Luc. His late father, Mortimer, was an insurance agent and financial planner. His mother, Rosalie, was a teacher until she began dabbling in real estate. Greenspon's older sister, Ina, a teacher, lives in Santa Barbara, Calif.

Greenspon, married to Carleton University journalism professor Janice Neil since 1983, was propelled into newspaper work by an abiding interest in current events and politics. After graduating from Carleton University–with an honours degree in journalism – in 1979, he joined the Lloydminster Times, a small-town daily with two reporters on staff. The editor who hired him was a Wagar High School alumnus.

In Lloydminster, which straddles the Alberta-Saskatchewan border, Greenspon was a jack-of-all-trades as a reporter. The town was so culturally different that he felt like a foreign correspondent. A year later, he found himself at the Regina Leader-Post, writing police, agricultural and business stories. Then, for the next two years, he was successively the Edmonton and Regina bureau chief of the Financial Post, covering the prairie provinces.

Greenspon went back to school in 1984 and completed a graduate degree in political science at the London School of Economics as a Commonwealth Scholar. Returning to Canada, he reincarnated himself a business reporter at the Globe, specializing in media industries.

Edward Greenspon

His rise at the Globe has been nothing less than meteoric. Although Greenspon had been at the Globe a little more than a year, the then managing editor invited him to be its first European business correspondent, based in London. "I didn't apply for the job. It was offered to me." Asked to explain this extraordinary stroke of fortune, Greenspon observed, "They were looking for someone with business writing experience, and it was attractive to them that I had lived in England."

Greenspon, who works in a glass-enclosed office in the newsroom, ascribes his success to hard work. Addis, his boss, said that his dedication to craft is only part of the explanation. "He is very knowledgeable, first, especially about national politics. Second, he is a highly skilled writer and is able to illuminate complex subjects. Third, he loves news and gets excited by it. Fourth, he has abundant humanity. He is sympathetic, he reflects, he is generous. It is obvious that he would be successful wherever he worked."

On assignment in Europe, Greenspon was in the right place at the right time. He chronicled the economic integration of Europe and the global ambitions of Canadian companies. A witness to the historic political upheavals of the late 1980s, he filed stories about the end of Communist rule in Poland, the overthrow of Nicolae Ceausescu in Romania, the fall of the Berlin Wall and the reunification of Germany.

By chance, he was in Moscow for the aborted 1991 coup against Mikhail Gorbachev, and in Kiev for Ukraine's declaration of independence. "These were some of the most moving times of my life," he recalled.

As a correspondent, Greenspon enjoyed the sense of discovery in travelling to new destinations, but did not appreciate the inconveniences of the road or the absences from his wife. Back in Toronto after four years in Europe, Greenspon signed on as managing editor of the Globe's Report on Business. No sooner had he gained his bearings than he was appointed deputy managing editor. Suddenly, he was in charge of choosing stories for the front page.

As Ottawa bureau chief and associate editor, Greenspon wrote about the 1993 federal election. Then he focused on the continuing fiscal crisis and the 1995 Quebec referendum. The election was grist for his mills. In 1996, he co-authored the book Double Vision, The Inside Story of the Liberals in Power.

Looking back, Greenspon said he revelled in Ottawa's competitive journalistic environment. He relished dealing with issues that mattered, enjoyed access to decision-makers, and loved penetrating, sometimes successfully, the governmental veil of secrecy.

The father of three children, aged six, eight and 10, Greenspon was delighted to be offered the position of executive editor. But there was a downside to the promotion, the need to commute from his home in Ottawa to his desk in Toronto. "It's not a great thing," he said. Nevertheless, he sees his future at the Globe, and does not rule out the possibility of returning to writing one day.

Asked whether the idea of the editorship appeals to him, Greenspon seemed taken aback. "I don't know, but it would be a thrill."

Prof. urges community to serve the affiliated

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The way in which the American Jewish community is trying to deal with the rising tide of assimilation and intermarriage is wrong-headed, according to Prof. Charles Liebman.

Liebman, who is the Yehuda Avner Professor of Politics and Religion at Bar-Ilan University, is currently teaching at the University of Chicago.

He will be in Toronto this weekend under the auspices of Canadian Friends of Bar-Ilan University, and will speak at an Oneg Shabbat at Beth Avraham Yoseph Congregation on May 26, and at CHAT, giving the Ronald Heller Memorial Lecture on May 28, at 8 p.m.

His topic at CHAT will be Threats to Judaism in the Jewish State.

"We must reach out to those who are the closest to strongly committed," and create programs for them, rather than for the assimilated, he said, adding that the latter "will drop off anyway."

Liebman warned of tne danger of "diluting or distorting Judaism to be attractive to marginal Jews," claiming that this will only lead to a loss of Jewish identity.

The Jews lost through intermarriage or assimilation, he believes, would be lost anyway.

On the other hand, Liebman said, intermarriage is so acceptable today that even those interested in Judaism intermarry. "We should encourage them to remain Jewish, and to raise their kids as Jews."

He is opposed to organizations that try to attract non-affiliated Jews, by saying "you think you aren't good Jews, but you really are." Groups like CLAL in the United States have the attitude that they should listen to the non-affiliated, and adapt [Jewish practice] to what they want, he said.

This is not the case with such organizations as Aish HaTorah or Lubavitch, both actively involved in outreach, Liebman said. "There is no danger of their diluting Judaism. They are prepared to reach out and make them like us."

Israel is beginning to be more like America, he said, in accepting the notion of legitimate alternative conceptions of Judaism, such as Conservative and Reform.

Most Israelis, however, still see religion as a "uniform thing – something out there. They think that the rabbi interprets the law authoritatively, and it is for us to accept or reject that."

It is sort of like the old joke that "the shul I don't go to has to be Orthodox," he laughed.

While it is true, he said, that there is "conflict, cleavage and tension" between the religious and the secular in Israeli society, basically "we still all live together."

There is quite a range of Jewish identity in Israel from totally non-observant to the ultra-haredi, but most people are somewhere in the middle, Liebman said. The Sephardi population, for instance, is "overwhelmingly on neither extreme – they can bridge the gap."

The secular often believe that the haredi manage to receive an inordinate and undeserved percentage of public funding through less than ethical means, he explained. On the other hand, some haredi have "a disdain for public law."

The misuse of public funding is not confined to haredim, he said. "The media like to play it up."

Israelis resent that many haredi do not serve in the army, and see the West Bank settlements, which are largely Orthodox, as "dragging Israel into war," he said.

The sharpest reflection of the Americanization of Israel is in its political system, Liebman said. "The personality of the individual candidate is becoming more important than the philosophy of the party."

Weizmann Institute receives $15 million gift

By SIMONE JOSEPH
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — When Prof. Yaron Silberberg joined the Weizmann Institute of Science in 1994, equipment in the physics department was up-to-date and in excellent condition.

Six years later, Silberberg says the institute's once state-of-the-art lasers are getting old.

But a $15 million donation from the Canadian Society for the Weizmann Institute may change that.

The Canadian fund-raising arm has raised almost half of the $15 million it promised and has another two years to raise the remaining money which will benefit the newly formed Canadian Institute for Laser and Optical Sciences at Weizmann. The donation is part of the institute's Jubilee campaign, an effort to raise money for its endowment fund.

Professor Silberberg, who will be the first director of the Canadian institute, spoke about his research into the specialized field of ultrafast optics at a science forum in Toronto on May 7.

For laser, optical sciences

Optical science, which brings together physics and engineering, involves the design of optical devices and the study of how light interacts with materials. Sub-fields within optics include telecommunications, medical optics, X-ray optics, laser science and laser applications.

Silberberg's research may have far-reaching consequences. He is investigating a new method for laser microscopy and new ultrafast optical communication devices. His research could lead to optical fibres having a greater capacity to transmit information and faster Internet connections, he said.

The Canadian Institute for Laser and Optical Sciences will be a "virtual" institute, Silberberg said. It will not be an actual building, but rather a collaboration among scientists.

Two of the new institute's goals will be "to maintain activity in optics and enhance collaborative research," he said.

Film explores anti-Semitic episode in U.S. south

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — For filmmaker Simcha Jacobovici, history is not something that happened in a far away place to people long forgotten.

On the contrary, even an event that occurred in the southern United States 85 years ago can resonate today, he believes.

Hence the film, The Lynching of Leo Frank, the story of a Jewish factory owner wrongly accused of murder. The film will receive its theatrical premiere at the Hyland Theatre on Sunday, May 28 at 7 p.m.

The screening is part of a fund-raiser for the Riverdale Jewish Community Centre, a grassroots organization co-founded by Jacobovici that brings organized Jewish life to the Danforth area. Proceeds from the event will go towards community centre programming and to support the Beit Yosef Congregation, which is housed in the centre.

Following the presentation of the film, Prof. Clifford Kuhn of Georgia State University, creator of a radio documentary about the Frank case, will discuss anti-Semitism in America.

For Jacobovici, the Frank case was not a one-time freak event, but rather a symptom of something that runs much deeper.

"What you have is a very serious issue fundamental to Jewish life in North America," he said. "The question is, is it intrinsic to North American society? My view is that anti-Semitism is a very complex issue and we must look at it."

Jews today have not left anti-Semitism behind, he pointed out. It can play itself out in violence – the shooting last year at the Los Angeles Jewish Community Centre is one example – and in the desire by Southern Baptists to turn Jews into Christians.

These are "symptoms of the inability to tolerate Jews as Jews," he said.

For director Yuval Daniel, researching the Frank case led to some unsettling findings. There are still people in Georgia who believe that Frank was guilty and got what he deserved. "I think it's a situation where even if a bunch of angels told them he was innocent, it wouldn't matter," he said.

Daniel and Jacobovici will be on hand at the screening to discuss the film.

Jewish Life

Macdernity affects children

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

JEWISH EDUCATION
The Next Generation

By now it has become commonplace to admit that the various social ills of the west have invaded the lives of Jewish families. Unlike the U.S. president, most any teenager will confess to having inhaled a joint, if not delved more seriously into drugs. Drinking is de regueur, and sexual dabbling is omnipresent. Eating disorders, boredom, ennui and even petty criminality all lurk at our door.

As we live in a tragically scientific age, where statistics are the street level version of what was once called truth, those disturbed by such allegations continuously insist that the dilemma is not as widespread as the rumourmongers wish to make out, or at the very least, not as bad as what occurs "amongst the goyim."

The flaw with the former is that statistics are notoriously hard to amass in such cases and rarely reflect the scope of the calamity, as any sociologist could verify in assessing the actual incidence in society of say, rape. The latter argument, that we ain't as bad as the non-Jews, is so tepid a defence of Jewish morality as to somehow ring pathetic. To paraphrase from the now famous aborted moon mission: "Jewston, we've got a problem."

Regarding the specific populace of Orthodox teenagers, it is often striking how the adolescent's issues of family rift, personal depression or existential dislocation are passed off – and thus obfuscated – as being a problem with Torah observance. Yet it is perhaps more true to say that religion is often the manifestation rather than the cause of the child's difficulties. Instead of probing deeply into the heart of why a child expresses his or her discontent with God, prayer and Halachah, and what such rebellion represents, we in religious communities often resort to tried and true excuses: Macintosh/Madonna/Mcwire/ Macdonald's – simply "macdernity."

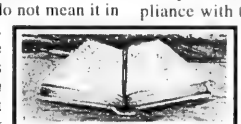
Such rationales are excuses, not because they are entirely inaccurate, but because they deflect the task away from ourselves and onto the big bad other. If Jewish education can play a role in inspiring young people and gently dissuading them from the unreality of legal and illegal distractions that constitute the ethos of our culture, it won't be as a compensation for the child's primary source of guidance and nourishment.

One thing is a surety and is repeatedly forgotten in the minds of many. Schools are not miracle workers and, for the most part, are not correctives to bad family dynamics, inappropriate social milieu, lack of love, punitive religious indoctrination (or on the other hand, lack of any religious training). Not to mention parents who value money over meaning or are too busy nursing their own wounds to be able to caress those of their children.

Not long ago, I posed the following question to my high school students. Would you sacrifice 50 percent of your parents' present income if you could go back to (earlier) childhood and arrange it so that your parents (especially fathers) would spend a lot more time with you – then and now – in a meaningful way? After a unanimous chorus of "Yes," I absorbed a chill of understanding about the current crisis in our midst.

The Jewish look

By RABBI MORDECAI E. ZEITZ



Rabbinic Reflections

All too often we have heard the phrase, "Funny, you don't look Jewish." This can be taken in many ways; I obviously do not mean it in any derogatory way. It just tells me however that there is a supposed Jewish look. So I ask, what does a Jewish look look like?

It is certainly not a physical look. We all come from such varied backgrounds that it gives Jews in general a full spectrum of physical appearances. Short, tall, light-skinned and dark, our physical looks certainly do not have a particular look, despite all of the insinuations about noses, etc. The mosaic of Jewish faces is made up of international colours.

Check the newspapers or magazines for their version of a Jewish look and invariably you will get a picture of an old Jewish man draped in tallit and tfillin or a woman straight out of the European shtetl. With no offence meant, is that the only authentic Jewish look?

The answer is that the Jewish look is not how a Jew appears but how a Jew looks at things; how a Jew appears Jewishly in the performance of their daily tasks. There is a Jewish look to the world and ongoing life. Even more significant, there is what the world looks for and expects from those who profess Jewishness.

The opening verse of this week's Torah portion declares: Im bachukotai tailaichu (if you walk in my statutes) – seemingly a statement of accountability for compliance and non-compliance with the laws of the Torah. But more so here is the key to understanding that Jewish look.

It is a challenge to make our chosen paths a reflection of Jewish moral and ethical values. Our chukim and mishpatim – in other words – our Jewishness – should not be limited to the confines of the synagogue or study hall.

The real arena for the expression of our Jewishness is in the very process of tailachu – wherever we proceed in life – whether it be the market place, social encounters with our families or amongst our friends.

It should be recognizable that despite changing societal norms which might sanction all types of behaviour, we have a particular behavioural code, a lifestyle, which we follow. While many things appear attractive, popular and ever-sanctioned, I have a road map called Torah U' Mitzvot which gives me direction as well as protection.

There used to be three magic words which normally got us back on the correct road. With a stern but caring look our parents, our teachers and even our peer group would just say – Ess passt nicht (it's not appropriate) – and nothing else was necessary. That was enough for us to get the Jewish look.

There was a kosher and treif having nothing to do with food. It had to do with behaviour patterns, attitudes and decision-making. Our reluctance to respond Jewishly to the ethical and moral dilemmas of contemporary society confuses those looking in from the outside.

Jewish law, Torah values and not societal norms assured our survival. It was the Jewish look – appropriately – the Jewish outlook that gave us the guidelines as to what was appropriate or inappropriate. When we did not look or act Jewishly – there was suspicion and confusion.

A beard and payot, or a sheitl with full dress but devoid of piety and ethics in human interaction is not the Jewish look. I don't lie or cheat but I have no need of Jewish ritual is not the Jewish look, either. The Jewish look involves the realization of Torah responsibilities and expectations.

A man in the synagogue was once honoured with hagbah. As he lifted the Torah high above his head, he was heard to ask: "What do I do with it now?"

If we pack Torah away as ancient Jewish memory then we stand to lose the Jewish look. What the world needs now is that Jewish outlook in the streets, in the office and in the home. The Jewish look is a reflection on each of us.

Jewish Life

Parshat Hashavua

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

We are currently in the period of Sefirat Ha'Omer, the seven-week period which begins in Passover and culminates with the giving of the Torah at Shavuot. So what better time to resolve to learn more about the book central to Jewish life? If you'd like to study Torah or are looking for material for your bar or bat mitzvah speech, there's always something to discover on the Jewish highway.

There are dozens of online commentaries available on the parshat hashavua (the weekly Torah portion) from almost every perspective imaginable.

From Rabbi Shlomo Riskin's weekly Shabbat Shalom [http://www.ohrtorahstone.org.il/parsha/parsha.htm] to Torah Hayim – Living Torah Study for Reform Jews [http://shamash.org/reform/uahc/torah/tindex.html] to the writings of Ismar Schorsch, chancellor of the Jewish Theological Seminary of America [http://learn.jtsa.edu/topics/parashah/]. And some parshat hashavua Web sites come with a bonus. At Torah Fax in CyberSpace, you not only get a weekly Torah commentary but you also get a link where people with health problems can ask for a speedy recovery [http://www.torahfax.net/refuah.html].

There are two different ways to join in the learning. You can either visit a Web site on a regular basis to check out that week's material and archived resources from previous years. Or you can join a list. Once you sign up, that week's commentary will be automatically e-mailed to you.

Some lists are one way only – you receive a weekly mailing. Others allow you to respond and offer your own insights. Most of these lists are "moderated" which means there is someone in charge to make sure the correspondence remains on topic – and civil. One of the most comprehensive list of links to parshat hashavua commentaries on the Internet can be found at Torahnet [http://shamash.org/reform/uahc/torahnet/]. Try out more than one to find rabbis or commentators who are best for you.

If you prefer to listen to a lecture rather than read one, try out 613.org: The First World-Wide Jewish Audio Since Mount Sinai. You'll find the parasha classes at [http://www.613.org/parasha.html]. According to the site, there are over 250 classes by speakers from all over the world. And there are more audio lectures at Think Jewish International [http://www.thinkjewish.com/].

Of course, there are some sites with kids in mind. In Kinder Torah, Simcha Groffman looks at the weekly Torah portion and suggests to parents some lessons that they may want to pass on to their children [http://www.shemayisrael.co.il/parsha/kindertorah/index.htm]. For example, parshat Emor contains the mitzvah of sanctifying God's name.

Kinder Torah explains how that can be a message to children to be representatives of God by giving up a seat for an older person or playing nicely. And for something different, go to Torah Tidbits [http://www.ou.org/torah/tt/] and click on Parsha Pix & Stats. Every week, you'll get a screen full of pictures that relate in some way to the Torah portion. Sometimes that relationship is straightforward; sometimes the connection is a bit cryptic. As the site says "ParshaPix are a great way to go over the parsha with your children, challenge them before they challenge you."

So learn, discuss and enjoy. But as you travel the Jewish Highway, please remember that what you print will often include God's name.

Respect the sanctity of the material.

Slender volume conveys much

Ravelstein*, by Saul Bellow Viking $35.

At 84, Quebec-born Saul Bellow is still vigorously creative in various ways. His new book, his 19th, was published just a few months after the birth of his daughter, his fourth child.

A recipient of the Nobel Prize for Literature (1976) and a three time National Book Award winner, he is the most visibly erudite of living American fiction writers. His books display awareness of an impressive amount and variety of modern intellectual thought.

Books
Bernard Baskin

Often Bellow's humour and narrative skill are overlooked by critics in search of cerebral content. "I know," he asserts somewhat disconcertedly, "they tend to think of me as a brain."

How Jewish is Bellow? His major characters, from Asa Leventhal to Augie March, from Moses Herzog to Artur Sammler, are infused with Jewish sensibility and emotion. Undoubtedly, he has never forgotten his rejection by the chair of the department of English at Northwestern University. He was told that as a Jew and the son of Russian Jews, he would probably never have the right "feeling" for Anglo-Saxon traditions or for English words.

Yet he is reluctant to describe himself as a Jewish writer. Some years ago, he insisted, "I have never consciously written as a Jew. I've never tried to appeal to a community. I never thought of writing for Jews exclusively…I think of myself as a person of Jewish origin – American and Jewish – who has had a certain experience of life, which is part Jewish. I had a Jewish life to lead in the American language."

Ravelstein is a thinly disguised fictionalized portrayal of Bellow's late, close friend, Allan Bloom, who achieved both renown and great wealth for his book, The Closing of the American Mind (1987), which became a surprising best-seller. The book was an indictment of the state of American higher education as well as of the 1960's counter-culture.

'Five years after his death, Chick (short for boychick) the novel's narrator – and obviously Bellow himself – recollects with deep feeling and some wonder his relationship with his friend, 20 years his junior and a many-sided teacher and scholar.

Ravelstein emerges as colourful, charismatic, overflowing, brilliant and witty. At the same time, this Falstaffian figure can be clumsy, insulting, self-centred and offensively gross and vulgar.

Short on plot, the novel is filled with good talk and detailed observation. The reader learns of Ravelstein's relations with his students and disciples, his love for the enduring verities of classical literature and his sybaritic delight in fine clothes, gourmet food, expensive furnishings – and sundry other pleasures. Bellow reveals what some readers will find shocking, that Bloom who was critical of homosexuality was himself a homosexual.

For both Chick and Ravelstein there is an abiding affection for Jewish ideas – especially the antic world of Jewish-American popular culture. Little given to religious faith, Ravelstein is nevertheless supremely self-conscious about his Jewishness. Surprisingly, at one point, he suggests to Chick that he attend High Holy Day services with his wife.

After his friend's death, Chick suffers a severe attack of food poisoning that almost leads to his death. He is lovingly nursed back to health by Rosamund, evidently his young and devoted wife. Both friends engage in spirited discussions about death and immortality, an ever-present reality for these two elderly polymaths.

Meditative and wise, this book swells with artistic irony and stylistic grace. It is a slender volume that conveys much.

שיחת הנשיא

גידי קורן וחברים

מה יהיה בצפון

הגדה בוערת

דגלים סוריים

Coast to Coast

Opposite sides join over immigration bill

Several Liberals, along with the Bloc and Alliance parties, supported the amendments, but their challenge was fended off and the bill advanced to third reading without the proposed changes.

Under current procedures, the Department of Citizenship and Immigration kicks off the legal process against suspected war criminals by serving legal documents warning that their citizenship may be revoked. Should the suspect contest the revocation, the case goes before a Federal Court judge, who determines whether the suspect gained citizenship on fraudulent grounds – that is, whether he lied about his wartime activities.

There is no court appeal from this finding. The proposed amendments to the bill would allow both sides to ask the Federal Court of Appeal to reconsider the case.

Citizenship and Immigration Minister Elinor Caplan, however, said the granting and revocation of citizenship must remain the prerogative of the federal government, not of the courts.

The case that has brought the issue to a head was a Federal Court decision last February in which Oberlander was found to have lied to immigration authorities about his wartime role as an interpreter with Einsatzkommando 10a, a killing unit responsible for murdering tens of thousands of Jews. He now faces an order-in-council revoking his citizenship, and subsequent deportation.

MP Andrew Telegdi, Caplan's parliamentary secretary, resigned last week when the government refused to include amendments that would allow for an appeal of the judge's decision.

"I did it because of the process of revoking citizenship in this country," Telegdi said. "We don't have due process of law."

Telegdi, who represents Kitchener-Waterloo, Oberlander's home-town, said the Oberlander case "triggered the unfairness of the process for me."

The absence of an appeal and the fact that a political body – the cabinet – makes the final decision on citizenship offends him, Telegdi said.

Legal researcher Kenneth Narvey, chief operating officer of the CCC, agrees. "The present system is bad for everybody. The government can't appeal and the friends of the accused feel it's unfair not to have the right to appeal… What we want are fair judgments that everybody can have confidence in."

David Matas, honorary legal counsel of B'nai Brith, said he favoured amendments to allow appeals from trial court decisions. Such a step could expedite legal remedies against Nazi war criminals, he said.

Currently, it can take one to two years from the time a Federal Court makes a finding against a suspect to the time his citizenship is stripped. In addition, lawyers for suspects are finding other ways of challenging the system, further bogging it down in litigation, he said. (Oberlander's lawyers have filed a 100-page brief with Caplan arguing against revocation of Oberlander's citizenship. She said she will review the arguments.)

By granting both sides the right to seek an appeal by the Federal Court of Appeal, the process would become fairer and quicker, it would negate a host of legal challenges and it would allow the minister the opportunity to seek a reverse of decisions, as in the Dueck case, that "are eminently appealable," Matas said.

Caplan told The CJN the government has made "a policy decision" to retain the right to strip people of their citizenship. It is a process that is used "in most Commonwealth countries" and it is fair, she said.

"There is an appeal to the cabinet and it is reviewable all the way to the Supreme Court of Canada," she said. "The government's view is that in a parliamentary democracy the government should stand accountable. The courts do not grant citizenship, the government does."

Policy decision to retain Cabinet's final authority

Canadian Jewish Congress president Moshe Ronen backed the minister, though he acknowledged the legislation may have to be changed at some point. But "not at a time when a Nazi accomplice is before the cabinet to be stripped of his citizenship," he said.

Ronen questioned Talegdi's concerns over the issue. "The timing is very suspect. It smells foul," he said. "There is no question in my mind that this is politically motivated.

"The amendments, in our view, are compromised by their origins. Considering the timing and their concern, we're not prepared to support them."

The Kitchener-Waterloo Record, meanwhile, recently published a 12-page summary of the Oberlander case and the issues it raises. In an article headed "Case sparks debate over justice," Philip Jalsevac reported that "thousands of people, many of German or Ukrainian background, have signed a petition demanding Ottawa take no action against Oberlander."

The newspaper's editorial backed Talegdi, noting he is supported by "the Ukrainian Congress, the Canadian Civil Liberties Association and – most gratifyingly – B'nai Brith Canada. This in a proposal that would benefit Oberlander if it were law today, is extraordinary."

The editorial agreed with Talegdi that "Canadian citizenship is too precious to be kept or lost on one person's opinion, even if that opinion belongs to a judge."

Chaplain links prisoners to community

There are between 60 and 70 Jews in the Ontario prison system at any one time – at least that's the number who identify themselves as Jews, Rabbi Weiss states. Of that number, about 10 percent are "frum," or observant Jews.

"The single greatest ethnic segment of the Jewish prison population is not Canadian-born," he continues. "It fluctuates. For many years it was Israelis, but in recent years, it's Russian-born first, then Israelis. Canada is third."

Many of the Russians who have been incarcerated are doing time for drug-related offences. Israelis, he said, seem to be involved in immigration issues.

Prior to his career ministering to the needs of the Jewish prison population, Rabbi Weiss served as a pulpit rabbi in Binghampton, N.Y. and Springfield, Mass. In addition to working with the prison population, he provides pastoral care to Jews in other institutional settings. Part of his routine is to visit Jews in 33 hospitals, 45 nursing homes and 24 prisons, most of which are within 50 kilometres of Toronto.

To aid him in this daunting task, Rabbi Weiss can call on seven part-time professional clergy who are on fee for service contracts.

In addition, Rabbi Weiss is supported by 36 trained "para-chaplains," lay volunteers who make visits to Jews in institutions, and "I have an army of 140 friendly visitors to go into different facilities, mostly hospitals and nursing homes," he said. "They provide a link, a bridge, to the community. It gives people a friend, a friendly face, someone they can trust."

On our visit to Metro East, the three prisoners we met clearly enjoyed their time with Rabbi Weiss, if only for the prestige an outside visitor gives them among fellow prisoners.

The first prisoner we meet is Igor (all the names have been changed by agreement with the inmates). He's in his mid-20s, tall, well-built and facing 10-12 years on drug trafficking and firearm charges. Although he's resigned to spending years in jail, he doesn't seem bitter. He's more concerned about what happens afterwards. He's not a Canadian citizen and he's sure he'll face deportation proceedings once he's served his time.

He hails from the former Soviet Union, a territory that is now controlled by Muslims. "The Muslims are throwing the Jews out. We came here as refugees."

Igor grew up in the Bathurst and Finch area of Toronto and he has ties to the Jewish community. He knows of 10 to 12 other prisoners at Metro East who are Jewish. Most are in different ranges spread across the facility, he said.

Like the other Jewish prisoners, Igor appreciates the kosher food he gets at dinner, sometimes also at lunch.

Igor, who's been awaiting trial for eight months, said he's experienced some anti-Jewish sentiments from other prisoners, but "it's not that bad here." He recalls seeing some inmates who had swastika tattoos. "They're mostly going against Blacks," he said. The fact he's a big guy and can take care of himself might be a deterrence, he acknowledged, and the guards keep on top of things.

On a personal level, Igor is grateful for the visits by Rabbi Weiss and the fact he brings him Russian newspapers and books. His visits also "give me someone to talk to. At least someone cares that I'm here."

Michael is in his early 20s. Unlike the others, he's Canadian born though his parents are both immigrants. He's been in Metro East for three months on drug charges and he spent two months before that at the Don Jail.

Michael has had some minor connections to the Jewish community. He attended parties at the Jewish Community Centre but admits he knows very little about Jewish life and tradition.

Like Igor, Michael enjoys the rabbi's visits, which give him another voice to talk to and someone to listen to his concerns. In prison, "you hold things in all the time. When you get together, you feel more joy," he said.

Michael has been in and out of prisons for nine years. In that span, he says he hasn't spent more than one year at a time out of jail.

Michael claims he's learned his lesson and promises to seek counselling once he's out of jail. "When I get out, I'd like to get help from the Jewish community," he said.

Alexander is in his mid-20s and was born in the former Soviet Union. At five his family moved to Canada. He's been in Metro East for two months awaiting sentencing on a conviction for fraud.

Alexander grew up in the Finch/Bathurst area and "all my friends are Jewish."

He says he enjoys speaking to "a Jewish person who understands my religion." He'd love to be in the same range with the other Jewish guys, but he knows that's not likely to happen.

Alexander has a sweet smile and angelic appearance. He admits he had a run-in with an anti-Semite during one of his various prison stays. He was put into the same cell with a neo-Nazi who had placed a swastika on the wall and who constantly made anti-Semitic remarks. Michael handled the situation jailhouse style. A mischievous smile comes to his face as he recounts the episode.

It's time to leave. Visiting hours are over and afterwards, with the Passover supplies delivered, Rabbi Weiss explains his pastoral philosophy.

In short, he says, he will not try to impose any value system on the prisoners.

"I don't come in with an agenda. I would never come in and try to push religious observance. I try to strengthen their observance if they ask me." For the 10 percent of the prisoners who are observant and who request it, Rabbi Weiss will provide tallitot and tfillin. However they're kept under lock and key in the chaplain's office. Even tfillin, with their long leather straps, can be used as weapons, he points out.

"I try to strengthen their ties to the outside community. That's what I see the chaplaincy doing, building a bridge to the outside so they don't feel isolated, alone.

"Even though they're apart from the community, they're part of the community. We feel they're important and shouldn't feel they're forgotten."

The visits "definitely make a difference," the rabbi continues. "I don't think the Jewish community pays that much attention to jails. It's not something they see as impacting on them. It's certainly significant that the community provides a chaplain and it's important that the community knows about it."

Web site provides insight into travelling in Israel

By NOAM SUGARMAN
Special to The CJN

Israelexperience.org features majestic pictures of the Jewish homeland and is user-friendly.

Personal accounts of people who have been on trips to Israel will make you long for your own fun-filled adventure. One young man, identified as Arthur M., describes his thoughts and feelings after reaching the top of Masada.

"I remember thinking about the mass suicide that happened up there years ago and I felt a tremendous amount of freedom and independence. It was amazing. No picture could ever capture the full impact of that morning."

The site was originally launched by Israel Experience Inc., but was relaunched in September 1999 by Birthright Israel, an organization that sponsors trips to the Holy Land. The site has an entire Birthright Israel trip section which answers frequently asked questions.

The site allows you to customize your own trip by selecting criteria from three categories: "Challenge Yourself" includes choices like camping, internship opportunities, and watersports; "Expand Your Mind" offers options like gaining an academic credit, teaching English or learning Hebrew, and the last category "Live the Culture" includes choices such as having an encounter with Israeli peers or participating in an army simulation.

A trip which best fits your criteria will be chosen from a list of over 200 trips.

This site is designed both for people who have already experienced Israel and for people who are contemplating travelling there.

The message board allows people who have never been on a trip to Israel to communicate with people who have been. It also provides a way for alumni of Israeli trips to keep in touch with each other.

The site's recently launched alumni corner allows ex-travellers to keep alive the feeling they had on their trips. It also provides a description of cultural activities and job opportunities within the Jewish community.

Afterword to host conference

TORONTO — Interested in the media? Interested in journalism? Afterword, a national paper for Jewish students, is hosting its second annual National Media Conference for Young Jewish Adults.

The conference will feature several journalists, including Rebecca Eckler of the National Post, Elie Tesher of the Toronto Star, Marsha Lederman of Talk 640 and "Humble" Howard Glassman of CFNY Radio.

Participants will meet students involved in the media across the country, listen to seminars on Jewish current events and engage in writing and editing workshops.

The conference runs from Sunday, May 28, to Tuesday, May 30, 11 a.m. to 6 p.m., at the Lipa Green Building (Canadian Jewish Congress), 4600 Bathurst Street, Room 420. Cost is $100 (includes all seminars and meals) or $40 for a one-day ticket. Register at afterword@compuserve.com or view the Web site at www.come.to/afterword or call Dave Gordon at 416-631-8053.

800 expected at annual Hoops for Hope

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — On Sunday, June 4, the parking lot at the Promenade Shopping Centre in Thornhill won't be filled with the usual cars, minivans and teenagers walking with shopping bags.

Well, maybe the teenagers.

Instead, it will turn into a huge basketball court, as, organizers hope, some 800 people will take part in the annual Hoops for Hope basketball tournament.

Proceeds will be divided between the Gift of Life Foundation (formerly Canadian Friends of Jay Feinberg), which raises funds for bone marrow donor testing and recruitment, and the Audey Stanleigh Leukemia Research Foundation, which currently funds a hematology lab at Toronto's Hospital for Sick Children that is trying to develop innovative cures for leukemia.

Talia Edell, director of the Hoops for Hope Tournament, has been an organizer of the event since the beginning.

"This year's Hoops for Hope will be supported by the Raptors Foundation and Headlines Sports. It will feature a slam-dunk competition; food; an expanded high school program; and prizes, which will include a car, gift certificates, sporting items and hotel stays.

Audey Stanleigh founded Hoops for Hope as a way to thank the community for helping him get a bone marrow transplant. Not as fortunate as Feinberg, he died from his illness in 1996. His family is still involved, and will be at the tournament, as will the family of Mark Walfish who died last year at the age of 20.

"It's so exciting," said Edell. "We are beginning to see Audey's dreams actualize."

Hours of play will be from 10 a.m. to 7 p.m. The rain date is June 11.

For more information, call 416-250-PLAY (7529) or e-mail www.hoopsforhope.com.

UJA FEDERATION

No one gift changes more lives.

Each year, we recognize the unique contributions of the many volunteers across the spectrum of community life. The year 2000, the first of a new century, has become a year of particular focus on history and its lessons. The critical lesson is that when we work together in the spirit of tzedakah, we are successful as a community.

As Jewish Toronto Tomorrow demonstrates, UJA FEDERATION is on a course emphasizing community partnership and collaboration. Voluntarism is at the heart of our future as we build the community of tomorrow.

Let us do more than dream. We can join together to create and build an even greater future for our community.

On behalf of UJA FEDERATION, I want to express our appreciation for your efforts today and for what we will do together tomorrow.

A Community of Communities

by Helen Finder-Guttman
Chair, Community Development
UJA FEDERATION

This Volunteer Supplement is the first to be produced by the newly-constituted Community Development Advisory Committee (CDAC). Our mandate is to ensure that UJA FEDERATION is accessible and responsive to the needs of our constituent parts – to ensure that we are truly a community of interconnected communities with shared goals and ideals.

Volunteers are the crucial component that ensures the integrity and viability of this model. It does not matter how or where one volunteers. What is fundamental is the choice to contribute.

This Supplement serves to recognize, although in a limited fashion, the efforts of some of the numerous individuals who selflessly give so much of their time to enhance our community. We are all truly richer for their actions.

To those featured here - and to those who are not – a most sincere thank you. The vitality of our Jewish community has been strengthened by your contributions. This community is now proud to be able to publicly honour you.

Yasher koach.

UJA FEDERATION
No one gift changes more lives.

Building Community - One by One

Soon we will read the Torah portion of baMidbar. At the very beginning of this parsha, we learn that G-d commanded Moses and Aaron to conduct a census "…by the number of the names…." What do the "names" add to the census? Aren't the numbers alone sufficient to render appropriate demographic statistics?

The answer, of course, is that every Jew is a unique individual with a special contribution to make to our community. Each "name" is holy in its own way.

This Volunteer Supplement acknowledges that there are numerous individuals who quietly give of themselves to the betterment of our community and who deserve recognition. They have been recognized as symbols of inspired and inspiring leadership. These "names" reflect the importance of each individual's contribution to community strength.

The book baMidbar is called "Numbers" in English even though it means "in the wilderness." Even a wilderness can be transformed into a spiritual garden if the numbers are treated with respect and dignity. The community is only as strong as the unique Jews who inhabit it and help to build it.

This is the message of both our Torah and this Supplement. We wish all those honoured here, as well as the thousands of other community volunteers they represent, a long and healthy career in community service. Mei chayil el chayil! From Strength to Strength!

A Tribute

Welcome to the sixth annual tribute to our community's volunteers. While each community group was asked to recognize only one volunteer, the faces you see here represent the thousands of individuals from the very young to the most senior members of our community who play a key role in building our agencies, schools, congregations and organizations. Their unselfish commitment in providing both "front-line" service and "behind the scenes" planning strengthens our community and improves the quality of Jewish life here in Toronto, in Israel and around the world. We salute these volunteers for their exceptional contributions to our Jewish community.

Join these dedicated women and men who represent the spirit of voluntarism across the broad spectrum of our Jewish community. THERE'S A PLACE FOR YOU!

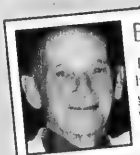
VOLUNTEER EXCELLENCE:

A Community Honours Its Own

The women and men pictured here have made tzedakah and community involvement constant priorities in their lives. Their unrelenting commitment to Jewish values and to preserving human dignity help enrich the lives of so many and instill enormous community pride in us all. They will receive their Volunteer Recognition Awards on behalf of the entire community at UJA FEDERATION's Annual Meeting, Wednesday, June 7th.

SHEM TOV AWARD RECIPIENTS

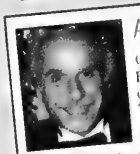
The Shem Tov Awards are presented to leadership representing the highest levels of excellence in volunteer service to Toronto's Jewish community.



BERT COHEN

Toronto Jewish Free Loan Cassa Bert, known for his generosity of spirit, sense of humour and intelligence is on the Board of Directors, having served previously as Chair of the Business Loan Committee, United Way liaison and Office Committee Chair.

"My role in commending loans to individuals who succeed in their business is truly humbling. It is my pleasure but is immensely gratifying to me. I derive as much pleasure as the recipients do."



AL (ALEX) GORLICK

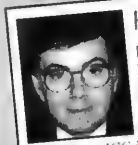
"While being involved with JCS from its beginning, I have witnessed the dream of a vibrant and effective Jewish campus organization evolve into a reality. It has been my great honour and privilege to be part of the lay and staff team and, most importantly, the enthusiastic students on the various Toronto campuses who have created this reality."



HARVEY G. KOTLER, Q.C.

Bloor JCC A member of the Bloor JCC for over 30 years, his commitment and expertise have helped promote a new long-term development vision. Harvey currently is Chair of the Board of Advisors and immediate Past President.

"The Bloor JCC is a marvelous, magical place representing the passion and excitement of a vibrant downtown community facility. My involvement as a Board member and President for the last two years has enabled me to help preserve its facilities and programs for the next generation."

TOM LOBEL

Bathurst Jewish Centre A man of diverse interests, Tom is currently studying at Harvard University for his Ph.D. in International Relations. He is Past President of the BJC and currently sits on the Strategic Planning Committee and Executive.

"Volunteering to me is the essence of being a Jew. If you can make time, you must."

LEADERSHIP DEVELOPMENT AWARD WINNERS

Leadership Development Awards were established to encourage young men and women to assume community leadership roles.

They are presented to individuals who demonstrate extraordinary community commitment and service.

DAVID BERON

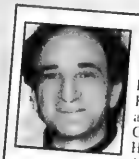
David's commitment to voluntarism began as a young activist in his native South Africa where he volunteered as a Madrich for Betar, a student youth group. His UJA FEDERATION involvement began three years ago as a founding member of the innovative Hands on Toronto program. Currently, Co-Chair of Young Leadership Division and the UIA Canadian Young Leadership National Executive. David has just returned from Poland and Israel where he was a chaperone on the 2000 March of the Living.

"Through volunteering, I get far more out than I put in. I have the opportunity to make a real difference in people's lives."

DR. MIRIAM ROSENBERG

Actively involved with UJA FEDERATION since '95, Miriam has demonstrated outstanding leadership as past Chair of Young Leadership, Young Health Professionals, the Walk for Israel, Canvasser Training and Super Sunday. Miriam, who is deeply committed to Israel, has led missions on behalf of the Young Leadership Network. A very busy dentist, Miriam is also an active member of the Alpha Omega Dental Fraternity.

"I feel fortunate and privileged that circumstances in my life have afforded me the opportunity to give my time to the Jewish community. Being a volunteer has been rewarding and fulfilling."



KEITH RAY

Kehilla Residential Programme Active for 16 years, Keith has strongly supported the management of all Kehilla related projects and has provided input into all activities. He serves as Treasurer, Chair of the Finance Committee, Treasurer of the Avenel Non-Profit Housing Corp. Board, and Treasurer of the Mutually Assisting Residential Community (MARC) Board.

"I am pleased to have contributed to Kehilla's accomplishments of helping bring to fruition affordable housing projects to life in the Jewish community. I also enjoy meeting and working with the other volunteers and UJA FEDERATION staff who have devoted a great deal of their time and energy to this worthy cause."

MICHAEL ROSENBERG

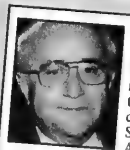
UJA FEDERATION of Greater Toronto Michael has been Co-Chair of the Societies Division for more than a decade and was instrumental in creating a Societies Advisory Executive and Board. His keen interest in youth precipitated his involvement with the Societies Endowment for the March of the Living.

"Volunteering means giving of oneself to the community. It has helped me to build myself and the Jewish fabric of this Jewish

NANCY RUTH

Board of Jewish Education of UJA FEDERATION Nancy's commitment to both Jewish continuity and Jewish education has been reflected in her life-long activities as a volunteer and a professional. A member of the BJE Executive and Board for the past three years, she is Chairman of the Supplementary School Committee & member of the Affiliations Committee.

"My involvement as a volunteer at Holy Blossom Temple, UJA FEDERATION's Board of Jewish Education, and the community-at-large has been a life-enriching experience."



RALPH SNOW ז"ל

UJA FEDERATION of Greater Toronto mourns the recent passing of Ralph Snow, who exemplified the true meaning of community commitment. A tireless campaigner, Ralph was most recently Co-Chair of the Societies Division. Ralph was awarded the Shem Tov Award shortly before his death.

"Decade after decade, Toronto's Societies have extended a helping hand to fellow Jews, without seeking anything in return. That's what Ralph did as well. He was a gentleman who symbolized tzedakah. We'll miss him very much."

Alan Sandler, President

JEFF WAGMAN

BBYO Jeff's involvement began in '72 as a member of Chapter Lorac. Quickly rising through the ranks, he serves as Chairman of the Board of Directors, Commissioner of the B'nai Brith Youth Commission, and member of the Board Development Committee of B'nai Brith International.

"We should all be very mindful of the type of community we are leaving for the next generation. I am committed to volunteering because I have a very strong interest in the continued growth and development of my community 20 and 30 years from now."

Lending Time to Tomorrow

With the recent launch of UJA FEDERATION's Jewish Toronto Tomorrow (JTT) initiative, there are now even more opportunities for everyone to get involved in the community.

JTT is a long-term plan – a blueprint for what we want our community to look like now, and 20 years from now. Through the UJA FEDERATION annual campaign, endowment funds and coordinated capital campaigns, JTT will ensure both refurbished facilities and ongoing services for Toronto's rapidly growing Jewish community.

Three vibrant campuses of Jewish life – downtown, midtown and in York Region – are key components of the JTT vision, so individuals and families can access Jewish programs and services in their own neighbourhoods. Through JTT, renovations will be taking place to the Bloor Jewish Community Centre and the Bathurst Jewish Centre, and a new 50-acre north Bathurst Street campus in York Region, is slated for development.

But JTT is also about a new community partnership in which organizations with dreams about new ways of meeting community needs will be matched with philanthropists who also share those dreams.

This emphasis on innovation will increase participation in Jewish life, and create more opportunities for volunteers to lend their professional skills to joint projects and management teams. JTT hopes to encourage a new era of community creativity, as schools and organizations come forward with their own innovative dreams.

"Jewish Toronto Tomorrow is a dream come true for anyone who takes pride in our incredible community," says Leslie Gales, Co-Chair with Barry Sherman of the Jewish Toronto Tomorrow Steering Committee. "It's a new way of looking at community planning – allowing us to harness the energy and creativity of our communal organizations to meet emerging needs."

Jewish TORONTO Tomorrow

But Gales points out that JTT's success is dependent on getting people involved in community in new and different ways. JTT projects will require active volunteers skilled in a variety of key areas such as finance, development, management, marketing and strategic planning. If all goes as predicted, dozens of fresh projects will emerge in the years to come that will require significant new volunteer resources to help make these dreams come true.

Stage Set for the International Year of Volunteers

The year 2001 has been proclaimed "International Year of Volunteers" (IYV), following a United Nations General Assembly declaration, and our community's volunteer organizations are enthusiastically endorsing the initiative.

"We, in the Toronto Jewish community, publicly acknowledge the importance of our community's volunteers each year," notes Helen Finder-Guttman, Chair of Community Development, UJA FEDERATION. "During the International Year of Volunteers 2001, we will proudly add our voice to other organizations around the world in applauding the valuable efforts of volunteers – something we consistently recognize and support."

IYV 2001 provides an opportunity to highlight the achievements of millions of volunteers worldwide and to encourage more people to volunteer.

More than 120 countries supported the proclamation, including Canada, the United States, and Israel.

New Community Development Plan Underway

A new initiative to enhance and strengthen relationships among organizations in the Toronto Jewish community has been announced by UJA FEDERATION. Its new Community Development Advisory Committee (CDAC) will respond to the needs of all community constituents.

"Community development is not a new concept," says UJA FEDERATION President Alan Sandler. "The philosophy of 'Kol Yisrael areivim zeh ba zeh – all of Israel is responsible for one another' – is not a passive imperative. It is a call to action – to contribute!"

The CDAC will strive to broadly expand communal involvement in social, recreational, educational, cultural, fundraising and community services, while drawing upon the unique abilities of all constituents to do so.

"We hope to encourage involvement and participation by all members of our communal family," adds Sandler.

Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University (Toronto Chapter)

Develops and promotes awareness, leadership and financial support for the Hebrew University of Jerusalem. www.cfhu.org

Harvey Naglie

"The Hebrew University of Jerusalem pushes a number of my philanthropic hot buttons: Judaism, Israel, scholarship. This, combined with the wonderful Canadian Friends that I have been able to meet and work with, explains why my involvement has been so fulfilling and enjoyable."

Canadian Friends of Tel Aviv University

Provides support for the educational goals of Tel Aviv University, facilitated by enhanced public awareness of the University's achievements, fundraising and the development of a strong local membership. www.tau.ac.il

Debbie Godfrey

"The opportunity to meet and learn from professors and students has been challenging. The diversity of programs and outstanding caliber of these individuals makes me proud to be associated with Tel Aviv University."

Canadian Shaare Zedek Hospital Foundation

To support and promote educational, research and patient care programs at Shaare Zedek Medical Centre in Jerusalem. www.szmc.org.il

Evan Sone

"Creating the Shaare Zedek Ski Day and watching it become a successful fundraising event has been very rewarding. As the father of premature triplets, raising funds for the Neonatal Intensive Care Unit of Shaare Zedek is especially meaningful to me."

Canadian Society for the Weizmann Institute of Science

Expresses the commitment of the Canadian Jewish community to help Weizmann Institute maintain its standards of excellence and its significant contributions to world science and Israel. www.weizmann.ac.il

Brian J. Steck

"Weizmann represents what's best about science, technology, research and Israel. I'm extremely proud of its contributions to all of humanity and consider it a privilege to serve as the incoming President of The Canadian Society."

Chabad Lubavitch

Dedicated to preserving and perpetuating Judaism through innovative programs, learning opportunities and publications that encourage ritual observance. www.chabadtoronto.org

Louise Goldberg

"Visiting the sick (Bikur Cholim) in a hospital allows me to reach out to members of the Jewish community. The courage shown by the patients and their families inspires me to demand more of myself."

Circle of Care

Facilitates and supports independent living in the community and promotes individual health, well-being and quality of life. www.circleofcare.com

Ruth Fox

"Kosher Meals on Wheels has provided me with the opportunity to give time and effort to those who cannot provide for themselves. The enjoyment of working with dedicated people is beyond measure."

Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT)

Striving for excellence in all aspects of education, CHAT provides each student with a Judaic and General Studies education in a co-educational setting. www.jewishtoronto.net

Baila Lubek

Since January 1999, Baila Lubek has served as the first woman President of CHAT. In an action-packed year of dynamic leadership, she has steered CHAT through major construction projects, initiated future planning and brought new cadres of volunteers on board.

Downtown Jewish Community Council

Promotes Jewish institutions and organizations; encourages Jewish educational opportunities; unifies the downtown Jewish community in all its diversity; promotes outreach to the unaffiliated; and, promotes community activities and holiday celebrations. www.bloorjcc.on.ca

Paul Appleby

"What a challenge to be a member of the DJCC, whose member organizations represent such different perspectives! Working on the Learning Council and helping make a Community Seder has all been a joy."

Downtown Jewish Community School

Provides Jewish students with a basis for Jewish identity in a pluralistic community. Students are taught the concepts and skills necessary to live a Jewish life and to feel comfortable within a Jewish setting. www.jewishtoronto.net

Leslie Mendelson

"My earliest involvement in the school was my most meaningful experience. I have chaired a Board of wonderful volunteers but I most enjoyed the years I spent facilitating holiday celebrations in this terrific community."

Dr. Abraham Shore Academy/ She'arim Hebrew Day School

Canada's first and only Jewish school for children with learning disabilities and attention deficit disorders. Programs are designed to help students reach their personal and academic potential by providing them with strategies to manage their difficulties.

Debbie & David Diamond

"At Canada's only Jewish day school for children with learning disabilities, the opportunity to do community work for these children and see the difference any volunteer can make is truly rewarding."

Emunah Women of Toronto

An international women's Zionist organization with a long history of providing children and adults in Israel with a broad education and strong Jewish values. www.icomm.ca/emunah

Edie Kalb

"Emunah has given me the opportunity to develop my creative and leadership skills and to work with women from the whole spectrum of our community for the benefit of the citizens of Israel."

Habayit Shelanu Seniors Residences Corp.

A unique living environment based on recognition of the changing needs of older adults. Committed to providing an environment that fosters a positive Jewish identity. habayit@volnet.com

David Herlick

"I have been a volunteer with Circle of Care for 25 years, having served as both Treasurer and President. During all that time, seeing the establishment of Habayit Shelanu was the most meaningful experience. It is not only bricks and mortar, but is truly a place one can call 'home.'"

Holy Blossom Temple

A Canadian Congregation of Jewish men and women who are committed to the principles of Reform Judaism.

dtameanko@holyblossom.org

Matilda Bigio

"During 19 years of membership, I've received a great deal of support from fellow congregants. My way of giving back is by volunteering. I lead services as lay cantor; act as Gabbai; sing in the choir; volunteer in the gift shop; and, in the 'Out of the Cold' and 'Bikur Cholim' programs."

Israel Cancer Research Fund

David Liss

"My parents have instilled in me the importance of voluntarism and community work. My involvement in ICRF began at age 9, stuffing envelopes and filling loot-bags. Today, I bring my computer skills and telecommunications knowledge. It gives me great pleasure to have organized an event to help raise funds for cancer research."

Jewish Camp Council of Toronto

Provides residential, recreational camping services to the community, geared to the social needs of the recipient, regardless of ability to pay. Camping services for children provide an opportunity to learn and enjoy recreational skills, while gaining independence and self-sufficiency in a caring Jewish environment. www.campnbb.com

Betty Winston

"Working with seniors was the beginning of my involvement. However, the additional experience of the bright and happy looks on the faces of the children arriving from camp has continued to provide meaning to my activities."

There's A Place For You!

Jewish Campus Services of Greater Toronto*

Committed to building Jewish identity, nurturing intellectual development, and fostering spiritual growth in a pluralistic university and college setting. www.jewishcampusservices.com

Meny Grauman & Jeremy Zacks

"Volunteering is personally rewarding. I can do something to enhance the growth of our shul and the community."

Kolel: The Adult Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning

A pluralistic, egalitarian progressive communal adult education centre that, through the study of traditional texts, gives students Jewish "roots" – a connection to their heritage – and Jewish "wings" – the freedom to apply that knowledge as they best see fit. www.kolel.org

Marla Buck

"I have had the opportunity to create a vibrant meeting place for today's thinking Jewish minds. This gave new meaning to the term 'Living Torah' – taking what one's been given, seeing the good, and bringing it to life. The colourful, warm and appreciated result is a true reflection of Kolel's generous, genuine and infectious spirit."

Coast to Coast

Federal politics generates lots of irony

Politics in Ottawa is capable of generating lots of irony. Take for example, privacy commissioner Bruce Philips' recent discovery of the files on 33.7 million Canadians that have been collected over the past 15 years.

However you may regard the fact of the database, it' s got to make you chuckle that the Keeper of the Knowledge is Human Resources and Development. The very department that cannot accurately account for $1 billion is responsible for tracking and protecting the confidentiality of our life histories.

Irony is also the common thread that weaves through many of the other mainstay stories followed in the media. You will recall that just prior to the Liberal party meeting in Ottawa last March, a Paul Martin-led cabal was revealed and served as the backdrop to the convention. Chrétien spoke tough, Martin was reined in and the fire smoldered on.

Before this, it was common knowledge that Chrétien's principal advisor, his wife Aline, was urging him to step down before the next election. Word now has it, that she was so offended by the meeting Martin held with his supporters, she has insisted that Chrétien stay on for a third run.

Scene in Ottawa

By G.K. SIMCOE

Irony extends to the labour movement as well. Following a huge victory against the government on the pay equity issue, the Public Service Alliance of Canada (the largest union in Canada) had a convention of its own. Outgoing president, Daryl Bean told his members that PSAC was bankrupt and that just when PSAC members stood to collect $3.4 million, dues would increase substantially for PSAC to meet its own pay-equity obligations.

The irony award of the week, however, has to go to the Tories. First, the Progressive Conservative party was judged a modest victory for Joe Clark. The highlight of the convention was a three-hour cameo appearance by Ben Mulroney, who iced the evening by shaking hands with Clark's daughter Catherine. For those of you who recall the bitter feuds between Clark and Brian Mulroney, what could be more ironic than Brian's proxy being sent to lend support to Clark through Catherine?

Well, the only thing that could be more ironic than that is Clark claiming victory in the Newfoundland by-election that the Tory candidate won by a margin of 159 votes. This is a seat the Tories have held for the last 37 years. Only one so desperate as Clark could see that as a victory.

Top court rejects Katriuk appeal

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Vladimir Katriuk faces denaturalization and deportation following a recent failed appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada.

Katriuk was judged by the Federal Court in January 1999 of having hidden his Nazi-linked past in order to enter Canada in 1951.

The Supreme Court said it would not listen to an appeal by the 78-year-old retired Ormstown beekeeper, whose case was the first war crimes case to be heard in Montreal by the Federal Court.

Last December, the Federal Court of Appeal, which is one step below the Supreme Court, also ruled that Katriuk could not appeal his conviction.

In the original Federal Court judgment against Katriuk following proceedings launched by the minister of citizenship and immigration in 1996, Judge Marc Nadon found that Katriuk concealed his volunteer membership in Ukrainian SS Unit 118 when he applied for a visa for Canada.

The unit, which was under German control, was implicated in numerous war crimes against civilians, including Jews, in Byelorussia (now Belarus), from 1942 to 1944.

Nadon ruled that when Katriuk applied to come to Canada from Paris, where he had fled after deserting his battalion – it had retreated to France in the face of advancing Soviet forces – he "must...have been asked to answer...details regarding his participation in Battalion 118."

At the same time, Nadon said there was no proof that Katriuk was actually involved in atrocities against civilians, only that he applied to come to Canada under false pretenses.

"The respondent's [Katriuk's] evidence was simply that the visa officer did not ask him anything. I do not find his version of events plausible," Nadon ruled.

In 1958, Katriuk was granted Canadian citizenship, even after admitting to federal officials that he used his brother-in-law's name, Nicholas Schpirka, when he applied to come to Canada.

Katriuk's lawyers had argued before the Court of Appeal that denying him the right to appeal contravened the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. But Canada's Citizenship Act stipulates that individuals found to have entered Canada fraudulently have no right to appeal.

Media reports indicate, however, that Nestor Woychyshyn, Katriuk's lawyer, has said he will still try to appeal to the immigration department or to the federal cabinet.

A second Montreal war crimes case, against 80-year-old Rosemount resident Walter Obodzinski, is currently before the Federal Court.

Obodzinski is also being investigated for allegedly concealing information – his membership in a Nazi-run police unit in Poland – from Canadian immigration officials, when he applied for a Canadian visa.

The unit was implicated in the murder of 4,000 Jews and the deportation of thousands of Poles to slave-labour camps.

Obodzinski became a Canadian citizen in 1955.

"Confessions" mounting from the trial in Iran

"They are illegal because they were secured in detention and without counsel present," Cotler told The CJN. "These defendants have been held incommunicado for over a year. That constitutes deprivation of liberty and thus, the confessions secured are inadmissible under international law and under Iranian law."

Besides, Cotler believes the confessions were coerced and scripted. And Iran's definition of espionage, he noted, is broad. Even sending a greeting card to a relative in Israel is a criminal offence.

However, Cotler is hopeful on two matters: A spokesperson for the court last week stated that the charges against the detainees are not punishable by death under Iranian law because none had violated the Islamic legal tenet of moharebeh – taking up arms against God or the state.

However, Cotler believes than the nine who have confessed, and possibly the one who hasn't, face prison terms of between 10 and 15 years on reduced charges involving espionage.

He feels the verdict in those cases has been pre-determined by the closed-door Revolutionary court, which is not part of an independent judiciary.

Cotler and other international observers agree that the three Jews who have been out on bail will likely be acquitted on all charges and freed.

They have been told to return to court this Wednesday, May 24, without their lawyers, to confront those who have testified against them.

All the 13 Jews have had their rights violated under Iranian law because of "major pre-trial violations" and their denial to fair hearings, Cotler said.

According to one report last week, one of the defendants, Javid Beit-Yacoub, 42, told the court that religious motives drove him to collect photographs of Iranian military facilities for Israel, which he visited for 45 days in 1993. It was not immediately clear whether Beit-Yacoub's testimony amounted to a guilty plea.

Cotler and others point out that the judge in the case also acts as the prosecutor. There is no jury. Revolutionary courts try espionage, murder and economic crimes.

Israel has steadfastly denied that any of the detainees were its spies.

The nine "confessions" have cast a shadow over the proceedings, as well as on Iran's 25,000-member Jewish community.

"Based on the way the trial has been portrayed, and broadcasting two of the confessions on television, the entire community is now suspect," said Pooya Dayanim, spokesperson for the large Los Angeles-based Council of Iranian American Jewish Organizations.

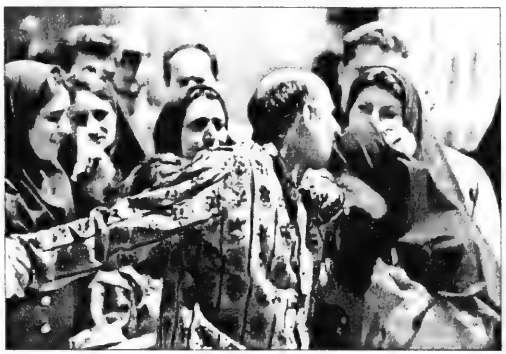
"It also points to the prevailing anti-Semitism among the Iranian people, that they have been so willing to buy into this propaganda."

Meanwhile, Dayanim and others expressed skepticism about the Iranian judiciary official's assurances that none of the 13 will face execution.

"I don't know how much we can trust these things they say," said Sam Kermanian, secretary-general of the Los Angeles-based American Iranian Jewish Federation.

"At the end of the day, it will depend on the political climate. The verdict will not be a judicial decision; it will be a political decision. We have to be prepared for the worst-case scenario at all times."

Many hardline Iranian clerics have reportedly portrayed the "Iran 13" as traitors and called for their executions.



Javeed Beit-Yaqoub, one of the accused, embraces his family outside the court. He had "confessed" to the charges earlier. [Kahl photo]

This month's closed-court confession of Asher Zadmehr, the senior religious leader in Shiraz, where the trial is taking place, came on the heels of a similar "confession" earlier by another religious leader, Nasser Levi-Haim, 46.

Zadmehr, 49, is believed to be a university English instructor and the most learned of the Shiraz Jews, a very Orthodox community.

Zadmehr, also the oldest of the 13 Jews on trial, reportedly admitted he had lived briefly in Israel before the 1979 Islamic Revolution, but returned home soon after.

He was quoted as having admitted that he collected cultural information about Iran and analyzed material brought in by other accused spies.

But Zadmehr also denied he was the mastermind behind the spying, as some Iranian media reportedly asserted.

Outside the courtroom, Zadmehr burst into tears after being embraced by his distraught wife and two children, according to news reports.

Dayanim said the latest developments were prompting concerns about the community's physical safety.

"The Jewish community is shocked and scared. Many have stopped going to work and sending their children to school, because they're afraid of being taunted."

In another sign that Iran is trying to quell international criticism, the judge in the case allowed the first two foreign observers – two lawyers from the French-based organization Lawyers Without Borders – to visit the courtroom last week, but only when it was empty.

They were barred from the actual hearings, according to news reports.

In what may be an effort to paint this case as not explicitly anti-Jewish, court officials, for the first time, offered vague descriptions of the eight Muslims said to be accomplices in the spy ring.

Several work as high-level figures in the provincial military and health services, though they remain unnamed and out on bail, officials said.

According to Malcolm Hoenlein, executive vice-chair of the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations, verdicts and sentences could be handed down by the end of this month.

Regardless of the Iranian manoeuvres, advocates like Hoenlein are working to ensure that Iran pays a price for its handling of the case.

U.S. Secretary of State Madeleine Albright has warned that the outcome of the trials could have international repercussions.

While some countries have indicated they may withdraw their ambassadors from Iran and cut their diplomatic relations if the judgments are seen as excessive, Hoenlein wants to hit Iran where it hurts – financially.

His organization was planning to press member countries of the World Bank to further delay or cancel a planned $231 million loan package to Iran at the World Bank's meeting last Thursday.

The larger of the two loans, for $145 million, would improve waste water collection and distribution for some 2.1 million people in greater Tehran. The second loan, for $86 million, would improve the quality of primary health care and family planning services in both rural and urban areas.

Canada, the United States, Austria and France are fighting against the loan, said Hoenlein, while Germany supports it.

A WORLD OF VALUES

Plan would create PA zones in J'lem

By NADAV SHRAGAI
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — An Israeli team in Stockholm for "back-channel" final status talks with the Palestinians has taken along a paper that outlines a detailed plan for setting up autonomous Palestinian quarters in Jerusalem within the framework of Israeli sovereignty over the city.

The plan, which the team is to use to guide it in negotiations, has been termed as providing a "intermediate solution" intended to get around the divisive issue of sovereignty over the city. However, the intended duration of this intermediate solution and a final date for settling the issue of Jerusalem has not been stipulated in the plan.

According to the paper, the Palestinian quarters in Jerusalem would get broad municipal responsibilities as well as symbolic security powers. Under the proposal, two boroughs would be set up – one Jewish and one Arab – with a joint municipality over them to be headed by a Jewish mayor, since a majority of the city's population is Jewish.

The Palestinian quarters and borough would be linked to the Palestinian Authority.

Civilian affairs such as education, health and culture would be administered by the Palestinian quarters, which, along with the Palestinian borough, would be empowered to set taxes and establish their own courts for local affairs. East Jerusalem would also have a Palestinian civil guard, with responsibilities similar to those currently carried out by the Jerusalem civil guard.

Under the proposal, the authority for planning and building would not be handed over to the Palestinians, but a way would be found to have them take part in that aspect of the city's life.

Leadership in the Palestinian quarters would be determined by the the Arab population of east Jerusalem. They would be linked in some fashion to the PA – in precisely what manner remains to be negotiated – so that the PA could provide services to east Jerusalem residents.

The Arab quarters would not include the Old City or other holy sites, which are envisioned as holding a special status and being administered through a joint Jewish-Muslim-Christian religious administration. Religious shrines would remain under the control of the religious group that currently controls each shrine.

Under the plan, the Temple Mount would be defined as a religious site, but the Palestinians would be allowed to fly their flag or a Muslim flag only on the mosques there. Access to worshippers of all religions would be guaranteed at all religious sites, including to Jews wishing to go to the Temple Mount.

TAU to inaugurate 'Jewish Nobel Prize'

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

TEL AVIV — Tel Aviv University has announced plans to award "the Jewish people's Nobel prize."

The university president, Prof. Itamar Rabinovich, made the announcement last week, a few days before a scheduled Board of Trustees meeting. Rabinovich said the university would set up a fund that would award three prizes worth $1 million each on an annual basis.

Rabinovich explained that each prize would be awarded to an individual or a group in three different areas – past, present and future.

The "past" prize will be awarded for work in areas such as history or archeology; the "present" prize will be given to someone recognized for contribution to public welfare; the winner of the "future" prize will be for work in the sciences.

The project is being financed by Jewish businessman Dan David, who currently resides in Italy. David made his fortune in the field of printing and photography and is head of the board of directors of Photo-Me, an international firm with automatic photobooths in 100 countries around the world. He is to be awarded an honorary doctorate from the university.

Early IDF withdrawal from Lebanon possible

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The recent escalation of fighting in southern Lebanon has strengthened IDF assessments that there may be no choice but to bring forward the withdrawal, according to military officials.

Three soldiers were wounded last Thursday, two of them seriously, in heavy Hezbollah shelling of outposts across the security zone. Shells also fell inside Israel.

The army is scheduled to complete most of its preparations for the withdrawal by June 1. It could take place as soon as a week or two after that.

Senior military officials said last week this could become the IDF's recommendation, if the situation in Lebanon continues to deteriorate. The army's main fear is of losing control of the situation, they said.

Prime Minister Ehud Barak will also have to take the political aspects of the crisis into consideration. Officials are aware that Israeli public opinion is not likely to be very understanding of casualties suffered in outposts such as Reihan and Ishiya, far from the northern border, so close to the pullout date.

Meanwhile Barak is sticking by his position that there is no reason for a significant change in the timetable. He believes the withdrawal must be completed in accordance with the United Nations, which is expected to rule on whether Israel has withdrawn in keeping with UN Resolution 425. The UN still needs time to reorganize its troops for deployment in the south.

Under instructions from Barak, the army is, for the present, refraining from responding harshly to Hezbollah's persistent shelling of IDF outposts along the border.

Chief of Staff Shaul Mofaz said last week Israel must take care not to walk into a Hezbollah trap and escalate the situation. Hezbollah is testing its methods of operation for the period after the IDF pulls out.

Hezbollah is strengthening its artillery forces and has received long-range rockets from Iran which could hit Afula and the outskirts of Haifa.

The Week in Israel

May 15

• Five Palestinians were killed and hundreds more wounded during violent clashes in the West Bank and Gaza with Israeli troops. The riots were organized by Palestinian leaders to mark Israel's 52nd anniversary.

May 16

• Israel transferred two military outposts in south Lebanon to the South Lebanese Army as part of its plan to evacuate the IDF from Lebanon by July.

• Israel and Egypt again discussed an underwater pipeline to supply natural gas from Egypt to Israel. If completed, the proposed pipeline would carry gas from Egypt to Turkey with exits at Israeli power plants.

May 17

• Political sources in Jerusalem told Israel Radio Israel had threatened to bomb PA Chairman Yasser Arafat's Ramallah headquarters if Palestinians did not stop firing on Israeli forces during the rioting earlier in the week. The head of the IDF Central Command denied the report which originally appeared in the New York Post.

May 18

• IDF officers met with Palestinian representatives to discuss plans to transfer security control over three Arab villages outside Jerusalem to the PA. The IDF said the transfer would not be conducted until an inquiry was held to determine who was responsible for the Palestinian gunfire on IDF soldiers last week.

May 19

• The cabinet approved a two-year package of grants and benefits worth approximately $400 million US to strengthen communities along the Lebanese border.

Russian Jews fear backlash against Jewish moguls

By LEV GORODETSKY
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

MOSCOW — A caller to the Russian State Radio Service's Jewish program made no attempt to hide her venom.

"You Jews have seized the TV and the radio and the newspapers. You are everywhere. You annoy everybody," said the caller, who identified herself as Yelena K.

Her words, typical of the many recent anti-Semitic calls to Jewish Radio made by ordinary Russians, expressed displeasure with the high-profile role played by Jews in the Russian media.

While the scale of anti-Semitism in Russia is sometimes exaggerated in the West, many of the nation's 145 million people have mixed feelings – at best – about the "Jewish influence" in the mass media, which proved to be a powerful political force in Russia's recent parliamentary and presidential elections.

After the recent search of the offices of one of Russia's most powerful media figures, Jewish communal leader Vladimir Goussinsky, some Jews are worried. They fear that a crackdown on Goussinsky and his fellow tycoons, some of whom are Jewish, could foment anti-Semitism and harm the Jewish community in Russia.

The raid itself appears to have been politically motivated – and had little to do with anti-Semitism.

Goussinsky may have piqued the Kremlin further by publicly criticizing Russia's war against Muslim separatists in the Caucasus, calling on the government to grant independence to Chechnya.

In addition, one of Goussinsky's main media rivals is Boris Berezovsky, a controversial Kremlin insider with Jewish roots, who is widely believed to be the main schemer behind President Vladimir Putin's meteoric political rise.

Berezovsky owns several important newspapers and controls the state-owned national TV channel ORT.

ORT, which reaches practically every Russian household, was used as a highly effective instrument of "character killing" during the last election campaign, when it destroyed two main potential contenders for the presidency – former prime minister Yevgeny Primakov and Moscow Mayor Yuri Luzhkov.

Russian Jews have a generally negative view of Berezovsky. He renounced his Israeli citizenship – which he had acquired in the early 1990s, when his political position was shaky – and was baptized.

Moscow's chief rabbi, Pinchas Goldschmidt, called Berezovsky "a double traitor to the Jewish people." But to many ordinary Russians, he is the archetype of the opportunistic Jew who schemes behind the scenes with unclear, but destructive goals.

Some observers see the raid as the first step in a campaign against Goussinsky. The raid may lead to a broader crackdown against Berezovsky and other media moguls as well.

Putin, after all, has vowed to chase the oligarchs, as they are known here, from the corridors of political power.

Others view the crackdown as an attack on freedom of speech.

But, as is always the case in Russia, there is concern about exacerbating anti-Semitism.

Many Jews think that any clamp-down on the Jewish oligarchs would strongly harm the Russian Jewish community.

Such moves would further the stereotypes about the "Jews who have sucked out and used to their own benefit all Russian resources, including the mass media, and now are being rightfully wiped out," said Alexey Vayman, a 26-year-old Moscow university student. "All of us would be held guilty for their real or alleged crimes."

The International Commission on Holocaust Era Insurance Claims has set up a process to handle insurance claims of Holocaust victims, survivors, and their heirs and beneficiaries.

For claim forms and information, call toll-free in Canada, 1-800-496-1974 (French speakers may call 1-800-498-2091).

Information is also available on the Internet at http://www.icheic.org

Payments from Germany and Austria

The Conference on Jewish Material Claims Against Germany (Claims Conference) in New York has negotiated compensation payments for Holocaust victims from Germany and Austria. There are several programs, including the long-time Article 2 Fund, with varying eligibility requirements and application deadlines.

For further information, call the Claims Conference directly at 212-696-4944 and ask for the Department of Services.

As well, the United Restitution Organization (URO) may be contacted in Toronto at 416-630-2920 or in Montreal, 514-931-7933.

Detailed information about these programs is also available at http://www.claimscon.org

German slave and forced labour payments

A process for making claims has not yet been created. The Claims Conference promises that the application form will be "short, simple and non-bureaucratic," but says the application process will not begin before the fall.

In March, Germany and German companies announced a $5 billion (US) restitution fund for war-era slave and forced labourers.

Again, the Claims Conference or URO may be contacted for details.

Swiss funds

In August 1998, Switzerland's leading banks agreed to pay $1.25 billion to settle Holocaust-era claims. A U.S. court still has to approve a distribution plan. Once that happens, information about how to file a claim will be made available in a worldwide ad campaign.

Also in 1998, Switzerland set up a $185 million fund for needy Holocaust survivors. Of that, $2.5 million was allotted to Canada. Those funds were distributed last year by a committee headed by Rabbi Gunther Plaut of Toronto. Roughly 5,000 claimants received an average of $500 each.

Further information

Potential claimants can also obtain information by contacting Canadian Jewish Congress, their local Jewish federation or Jewish family service agency.

Israel & the Jewish World

Barak meets with CJC Peace and Security Mission

OTTAWA — To show support for peace and security in Israel, the national executive committee of Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) recently sent a mission for meetings and briefings in Israel.

In Jerusalem, the group met with Prime Minister Ehud Barak and his staff in the government cabinet room. In response to the stated objectives of the mission to support peace and security and to express solidarity with northern Israel, Barak gave his assurances that security would be strengthened in the north after the withdrawal from Lebanon. He said retaliation against any attack would be much firmer in the future.

Barak and his staff also indicated that Israel is working with the United Nations, the United States, Russia, France and others to secure the northern border.

They said that peace with the Palestinians is based on six firm principles: Jerusalem to remain the united capital of Israel; no foreign troops to be allowed between Israel and the Jordan; no right of return for Palestinians except for humanitarian cases; no return to the 1967 borders; the Jewish settlements of Judea and Samaria to remain under Israeli sovereignty and to be annexed to the state; separation between the two peoples for security and political purposes; and cooperation for economic purposes.

The talks concluded with an overview of other topics, including Jewish unity and the fate of Jewish prisoners in Iran.

In northern Israel, the executive visited the Golan and Metullah, the recent target of rocket attacks from Lebanon.

"We could still see the smoke from mortar fire and hear bombardments in the distance during our visit to the town where the Canada Centre is located," said CJC president Moshe Ronen.

"We were struck by the courage and determination of all who continue to resist terror and to remain in the face of physical danger. The strategic importance of this small piece of land leaped out at us as we looked down from the Golan Heights on the whole of northern Israel and the Sea of Galilee."

Peace with Palestinians based on six principles

In Jericho, the mission met with the Dr. Sami Musalam, director general of Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat's office there. It was the first-ever CJC visit to Jericho and even more historic because it was the first-ever World Zionist Organization partnered trip that included a visit and meetings in the Palestinian Authority.

Mission members were impressed with efforts to enhance tourism as a way to promote peace. There were, however, considerable differences of opinion between the Canadians and the Palestinian representative with whom they exchanged views.

The mission was also briefed by Israeli military leadership at the Sheikh Hussein Bridge, which crosses the Jordan River and is a main throughway between Israel and Jordan. Joining his Israeli counterpart during the briefing, was the Jordanian commander in charge of the bridge. The briefing gave the executive members a clearer insight into the ways in which Jordan and Israel can co-operate in the spirit of peaceful coexistence.

"We had the opportunity to see and support the efforts and sacrifices Israel is making to achieve peace and security in the Middle East." Ronen said. "This mission will have long-lasting effects on each of us. It is something we hope to share with others in the coming months."

Eating disorders program provides food for thought

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — There are some things kids are just more comfortable talking to other kids about. That was part of the reasoning behind the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto's program called Challenges, Beliefs and Changes.

In the program, better known as PAD (because it is sponsored by Parents Against Drugs), trained CHAT students meet with their junior high school counterparts at feeder day schools to address issues related to drugs and alcohol.

The PAD program inspired CHAT guidance counsellor Margaret Klompas to propose a new program, What's In and What's Out!, in connection to issues surrounding eating disorders.

The program had its pilot this month, when 14 CHAT students – both male and female – spent two sessions with eighth-graders at Bialik Hebrew Day School.

At the request of CHAT, the program was designed by Jane Koh, in-school prevention program co-ordinator for Sheena's Place (a support centre for people with eating disorders and their families), along with a medical student doing a placement there. To the best of the organizers' knowledge, the program is the only one of its kind.

Bialik instituted the pilot as a preventative measure to put students in touch with issues like body image and self-esteem, said Debra Danilewitz, school counsellor.

For the high school students, the program is educational and provides them with the opportunity to take on a leadership role, said Klompas.

There have not been many cases of eating disorders among CHAT students, but the issue is on the minds of both parents and students, said Rabbi Howard Sacknovitz, the school's head of guidance. "Our focus is educational. We are educating toward a positive approach to body image. We feel it's a significant issue in the Jewish community."

The program touches on things that all kids face, said Janice Bacher, a Grade 10 CHAT student.

As part of a collage-making activity, groups of students selected realistic versus idealized images from popular teen magazines.

"We're looking for people who don't look like they starve themselves," said Bialik student Meredith Guberman.

"On one page it says it's okay to be the way you are, then you turn the page and there are skinny models," said her classmate Molly Rottapel.

"Normal people" don't have the kind of time models do to work at looking a certain way, noted Grade 10 student Ryan Banach. He also pointed out that the "ideal" girl, as skinny as she may be, is not necessarily healthy.

"Be happy with who you are," Bacher told the group of girls she worked with. "If you fall for these stereotypes, you'll never be happy."

Osteoporosis: the silent thief

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Osteoporosis, a bone disease that destroys both the quantity and quality of the bones, is called "the silent thief," because it develops over a long period of time, with no symptoms.

But the results of this disease, which affects one in four women and one in eight men over 50, are anything but silent.

Bones become so fragile that they are susceptible to fracture, Jerry Tenenbaum, associate professor at the University of Toronto department of medicine division of rheumatology, and consultant in rheumatology at Mount Sinai Hospital, told a packed house at the Leah Posluns theatre. He was speaking at a program called Osteoporosis: the silent disease, part of the hospital's healthy living lecture series.

He used overhead slides to show how osteoporosis causes a loss of height, and the ribs being forced closer to the pelvis, so that a simple attack of coughing can cause a broken rib.

The most dangerous fracture, Tenenbaum said, is a broken hip. "Breaking a hip when you are old is as bad as cancer. The reality is that 40 percent of those elderly who fracture a hip die within a year."

There have been tremendous advances in treating osteoporosis since the 1980s, he said, including bone densitometry, which measures the condition of the bones, drug therapy, and other therapeutic techniques for treating it once it has occurred.

Risk factors for osteoporosis include family history, being female, estrogen deficiency (for instance, after anorexia), calcium and vitamin D deficiencies, age, being of white or Asian ancestry, smoking, a very thin frame, the use of corticoid drugs, excessive intake of caffeine and alcohol, and premature menopause.

Proper nutrition, weight bearing exercises, prevention of falls, and lifestyle modification, can do much to help, as can hormone replacement therapy; newer drugs such as raloxifene and calcitonim, and fosomax, which increases bone density seven to eight percent. Tenenbaum said that this can decrease fracture rate by 50 percent.

He stressed the need for more research into osteoporosis, "at least as much as for cancer and HIV."

Joan Murphy, chief of gynecology and gyn-oncology, at Mount Sinai Hospital and the University Health Network, said that there is a relationship between hormone replacement drugs and an increase in cancer, especially breast cancer, but "the relative risk is small – an increase of two percent a year – after taking it for five years."

Each individual must be assessed according to their own risk factors and health, and "must decide for themselves on the risk-to-benefit ratio," she said.

The bottom line, Murphy said bluntly, is that hormone replacement therapy is "one of the best medical treatments for osteoporosis. People on estrogen live longer than those who aren't."

Nutritionist Fran Berkoff, Mount Sinai Hospital dietician, compared building strong bones to an RRSP – it is best to start at 15, not at 40.

Adequate calcium intake is essential, she said – 1,000 mg a day, rising to 1,200 after menopause.

If necessary, take a calcium supplement, she suggested. Tenenbaum, in response to questions from the audience, suggested that either calcium citrate or calcium carbonate are acceptable.

Vitamin D, which is necessary to absorb calcium, is also essential, either from the summer sun, or such foods as fluid milk, fortified soy foods and beverages or margarines.

This summer is all about breaking rules. Wait until you see the colour palettes, they are like a box of crayola crayons. There is absolutely no right or wrong. Lips are either drenched in juicy tangerine or paled with silver frost. Eyes are painted with electric blue or simply highlighted with a cool violet. It's time to walk on the wild side and let your spirit lead the way.

The sun's rays feel so good and can give us a healthy glow. Moderation is the key and always wear sunblock. Did you know that UVA rays can go through windows and clothing on sunny and cloudy days? UVA penetrates deeply, causing damage of collagen and elastin without necessarily leaving a tan. UVB rays are the ones that turn your skin red, so be careful, sometimes it's just not worth the damage.

Check out some selftanners, they are terrific, easy to apply, smell good and you can enjoy a sun kissed look with one easy application.

Make time to exercise daily, you will want to feel sexy on those balmy summer evenings. Make healthy choices, eat lots of fruits and vegetables and drink at least eight glasses of water daily. Get out your blender and mix up some shakes, they are low calorie, delicious and filling. Freeze fresh berries and add them to a water or soya milk-blend and you have a great drink in seconds.

CAROL'S TIPS

Skin Care: Body Clinique is a new collection of exquisite body care products. This comforting line wraps both body and mind in a silky cocoon. Cleansers, exfoliators and moisturizers are all housed in easy shower-friendly flip-top tubes. Get that just-back-from-the beach glow with Clinique's new Face Quick Bronzed Tinted Self-Tanner and Self-Tanning Lotion for the body. The Face Quick Bronzer is for Type A personalities. Instantly you are evenly bronzed and this two-timing product will impart a natural looking self tan in just 2-3 hours. Elizabeth Arden has a three-in-one product – Daily Bronzer Self-Tanning Boost for the Face. It is an oil-free moisturizer, light self tanner and instant colour that gradually builds up a natural self-tan with repeated use. Also look at their Quick Spray Tanner for the Body – it's mistake-proof and dries in 10 minutes. Dior treats us to two Instant-Glow tinted self tanners for the face and body. Both are exquisite. Lancome's Flash Bronzer welcomes a new self-tanning milk for a beautiful soft glow. Now with all these products, is there a need to bake in the sun? Of course not! Tackle fatty deposits with Body Light from Christian Dior. This triple action formula helps define your figure, giving it a firmer appearance.

The skin under the eyes is more sensitive. So, don't forget your eyecream, morning and night – Dior's Capture contour gel is great. Estee Lauder's Resilience Lift Eye Cream has an exclusive "lift complex" that promises to boost the quality of natural collagen so skin looks lifted and toned. Roc introduces Retinol Bi-Actif Pur that promises to reduce wrinkles in 12 weeks. It combines AHA and retinol to optimize the best results. Stila's h2off cleansing cloths are a must at all times this summer. These little wipes are housed in a sleek, very cool container and available at Holt Renfrew.

Foundation: Just a subtle sweep of Clinique's blended face powder in transparency bronze will flush your cheeks and shimmer your shoulders. Light Enhancing crème compact from Lancaster is silky, light and sheer. Perfect for touch ups and full coverage. Quo comes up with the perfect answer to sleepless nights – Bags Away will make dark circles disappear like magic and is available at all Shoppers Drug Mart stores.

Sweet Cheeks: Pinch My Cheeks from Quo is a light tinted gel that creates a soft flush with a bit of glitter – great fun. Elizabeth Arden's sugarplum blush is just the right colour for any skin shade – the no mistake blush. If you want a bronzer look at their bronzing Powder Duo. Art Stick from Bobbi Brown is great for cheeks and lips and what a great traveller. Check out Mac's Sheer Shimmer Powder in the colour Trixie, it is not only a great colour but wait until you see the glitter!

Eye Candy: Aquadior Waterproof Mascara and eyeliner pencils from Dior come in pretty colours and yes they do stay on. Limelight and sungold are gorgeous eye shadows from Elizabeth Arden's Easy Colour collection and the liquid eyeliner is great – wear it bold or smudge, but keep it close to the lash line. Bobbie Brown's sparkledust will add a touch of fantasy to your eyes and can also be swept on your cheeks or lips. Try Bobbi's cream shadow stick, it is easy to apply, making application foolproof. It is also long wear and water-resistant and contains vitamin C and E to help protect the delicate skin around the eyes. Bobbie Brown is available at Holt Renfrew's Bloor location. Mac's new eye paints are an absolute must this season. They remind me of my days of painting canvas with oils and acrylics. The texture, colour and long wear are phenomenal. Take a look at Stila's electric blue and lightning white eye gloss, they are just like lip gloss only specifically for your eyes.

Kissable Lips: Estee Lauder introduces Go Pout Lipcolour. This unique technology promises to give lips the appearance of fullness in one simple swipe, luscious, poutier, notice me lips will be yours in 10 fabulous colours. Long Last Soft Shine Lipstick in glow bronze from Clinique has a feminine touch of pink and be sure to dip your toes in their nude glosswear nail enamel — very sexy. Rouge Diorific in Mambo Pink is a "for sure" show stopper, worth the look! Mac's

B-Cup and Bombshell lipsticks are irresistible and be sure to top them up with their "underage" lipgloss.

Hair: Total abandonment is what's new for hair this summer, says Daniel from Salon Daniel (79 Yorkville-Toronto). Just wash your hair, massage in some styling lotion and let it be. Curls get curlier and texture and movement are key, he adds. Try Redken's new Active Express speed control. It is a one-step smoothing treatment and styler that lets you say good-bye to frizz and hello to smoothness. Also from Redken, try their new Sun Fit line consisting of Sun Shape shampoo, rehydrator and sun shield – great way to keep your hair fit all summer long. L'Oreal's Kids Tangle Tamer is fabulous for the "no" crying game.

Fragrance: Oscar de la Renta for men is fabulous in the balm, lotion or spray; my guy just loves the balm. This seductive scent punctuates Mr. De la Renta's philosophy that the traditional male values of chivalry, honour, style and romance are back. Alfred Dunhill's scent Desire inspires a world of energy, passion, lust and longing. Escada treats the ladies to Lily Chic, a silk veil of flowers that tingles our senses with the freshness of a summer breeze. Try Lancaster's Sunwater scented hair and body gel – it turns the daily grind into a day of sunshine – a new note of Riesling flowers is used for the first time. Aqua-Fitness is a group of three products from Biotherm Homme – eau de toilette, an aftershave gel and a shower gel. Scents of lemon, mandarin and cedar combine to give your man a "take me I'm yours" appeal. Chanel's Allure hair mist is not only chic and alluring, it conditions and contains odour captors. Hermes continues to spoil us with Caleche, Faubourg and Eau d'Orange Verte, all classic and great scents for the summer months. Check out Gucci Rush Body cream, it is true pleasure without guilt. It's non-greasy and luxurious enough to wear all over. Lacoste fragrance is like a breath of fresh air and is available at Boutique Lacoste.

Floral designs benefit Sick Kids Hospital

By CAROL WISE
Special to The CJN

The Blossoms gala hosted by Holt Renfrew (50 Bloor St. in Toronto) was a surreal experience catering to all the senses.

The show of one-of-a-kind designer gardens was in support of the Hospital for Sick Children's Motherisk Program, created in 1985 to provide information about the potential risks to the developing fetus or infant from exposure to drugs, chemical, diseases, radiation and environmental agents.

The flower arrangements were inspired by some of the best known fragrances in the world, as 28 companies, including Chanel, Calvin Klein, Sisley, Hermes and Dior, had designers choose the flowers to best reflect one of their fragrances.

Designing these spectacular displays were some of Toronto's most talented florists such as Suzanne Gardner, Lidia Tacconelli and Frank Rea.

Celebrities in attendance included Alannah Myles, Mike Bullard, Amy Sky, Renee Taylor, Joseph Bologna, Jon Voigt, Julia Ormond, author Elaine Dembe and the kids from the Lion King – Steven Allerick and Saskia Garel.

People watching was especially fun. The outfits were fabulous and colourful. Women wore hats adorned with everything from delicate rose petals to full gardens.

This was the first of what is planned as an annual event. Watch out for next years Blossom Gala. The Motherisk Program is truly a great cause – and what a party!

Enter Mephisto.

In 1965, in Sarrebourg, France, Martin Michaeli founded Mephisto with 30 employees. Today, 1,800 employees hand-craft 16,000 pairs of shoes daily; 15,000 stores carry Mephisto in over 40 countries; and 220 Mephisto concept stores bring customers the latest styles and designs.

Entrepreneur of the year

In 1999, L'Entreprise, France's leading business magazine, chose Michaeli from 11,000 independent French business people as Entrepreneur of the Year. And at a Palm Springs conference, CNN and Investor's Business Daily honoured him as one of the world's top entrepreneurs.

Mephisto's success is built on quality. Handmade from the best leathers and other natural materials, Mephisto shoes, boots, and sandals offer durability and comfort for work, play or formal wear. And they're guaranteed waterproof and breatheable for one year.

The women's collection combines fashionable elegance, state-of-the-art fit, and comfort. The sandals, designed with special respect for the anatomy of a woman's foot, are light, soft and stable.

Both men's and women's footwear have Air-Bag heel shock absorbers and Air-Jet ventilation. Other features include latex foam cushioned soles for healthy walking, genuine leather inner sole, and padded toplines for ankle comfort.

Mephisto's Spring / Summer collection offers a wonderful selection of sandals, from stylish dresswear to sturdy walkers. Both men's and women's sandals combine lightness, airiness and the orthopedic comfort of an anatomical footbed.

You'll find the shoe or sandal that fits you, plus a full range of accessories and leather care products, in Mephisto's Toronto stores: 50 Bloor Street West, Concourse level, (416) 966-2568; and 1177 Yonge Street, (416) 968-7026. For further information on Mephisto's complete product line, call Ralph Benisty, Mephisto's Director of Operations for Canada, at (905) 881-0050.

Moshe Bromberg's art on display

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — For the first time since his death in 1982, a selected collection of classic art works by Polish-Israeli artist Moshe Bromberg will be exhibited in Toronto.

The collection, which includes biblical miniatures, still lifes, portraits and landscapes, will be on exhibit at the Link Gallery, in the Civic Garden Centre at Edwards Gardens from June 5 to 18.

The historical works of Bromberg, who is also known as Bar-Am, spanned prewar Europe, the Holocaust, the State of Israel, religious themes, and Canadian scenes.

Throughout his lifetime, his extensive collection included oil paintings, pencil sketches, bronze sculptures and wood engravings.

Before his death, his works were exhibited at the Beth Tzedec Museum in Toronto, and in England, Israel, Argentina, Poland, Germany and throughout Europe.

In Germany at an exhibition of his paintings, he received a medallion of merit.

Bromberg, whose works can currently be found in Polish, German and Israeli museums, was born in Piotrokov, near Lodz, Poland in 1920. He studied in Munich and returned to Poland to continue his art studies. At that time, it was virtually unheard of for a Jew to be allowed to study at an art school in Poland.

In 1939, he was in his third year at the Academy of Fine Arts in Cracow when the Nazis invaded Poland. He and his entire family were taken away.

He was interned in a concentration camp where he secretly found ways to sketch his environment – grey paint captured Jewish prisoners pulling a giant roller over human bones as well as other tragic scenes of hiding, persecution and misery.

He escaped into the forest and made his way to Russia. In Lvov, he was able to continue his artistic studies. Only he and his brother survived.

He returned to the Lodz area after the war. From 1945 to 1950, he had many exhibitions throughout Poland and was honoured by the Polish art community.

In 1950, he immigrated to Israel and began to study his historical roots, finding the Bible a comforting source of inspiration.

He was greatly affected by the bright sunlight in Israel, and he created colourful paintings of landscapes and people.

After extensive study, he began working on a series of intricate biblical miniatures rich in detail. The miniatures are framed in illuminated art also found on Italian manuscripts and decorated prayer books.

He used a single strand brush to create, layer by layer, the tempera colours and awesome details. Each miniature took Bromberg six months to complete – more than 10 years to complete the collection.

The 20 miniatures include scenes of Belshazzar at the feast, King Solomon and the Queen of Sheba, the Maccabees, scenes from the Book of Esther, the Song of Songs, and others.

In the early 1970s, Bromberg turned down $200,000 for 18 of his miniatures. He said that he would not sell his works because he hoped to have them on display in a permanent exhibition.

In Tel Aviv, he was a high school art teacher and an art consultant at the Ramat Gan Museum. His two children, Eddie, a mechanical engineer and Miriam, an architect, had emigrated to Canada. Eddie told The CJN that he and his sister were educated by the ORT system in Israel.

Moshe Bromberg and his wife Berta made several visits to their children in Canada and joined them in 1980. In his two years in Canada, Bromberg created some outdoor scenes and had several acclaimed exhibitions.

Eddie Bromberg says that his mother is the motivating force in exhibiting her husband's works. The originals are not for sale and the family has arranged to produce several limited copies of Bromberg's works.

The artist's self portrait.

The opening of the exhibition will be held on June 7 from 6 to 9 p.m.

Edwards Gardens is located at 777 Lawrence Ave. E. in Don Mills.

PRIZE WINNERS ANNOUNCED FOR BOOK AWARDS

Nancy Huston's The Mark of an Angel (McArthur & Co.), a complex love story set in Paris during the Algerian War of Independence, has been named the winner of this year's Martin and Beatrice Fischer Prize for fiction.

The award, which includes a $1,000 honorarium, is to be presented at a festive 12th annual Jewish Book Awards evening June 7 at the Leah Posluns Theatre.

The prizes celebrate books on Jewish themes published in Canada during the previous two years. They are awarded annually by the Koffler Centre's Jewish Book Awards committee.

Painting by Erika Simon Gottlieb.

A special feature of this year's Awards is the launching of Chava Rosenfarb's two novels, Bociany and Of Lodz and Love. Originally written in Yiddish, both books were recently published in English translation by the Syracuse University Press.

Rosenfarb, the celebrated Yiddish author who has won the Manger Prize and many other awards, is slated to read from her work at the ceremony.

Other winners include Kathy Kacer for The Secret of Gabi's Dresser, a children's book; and Bruce Muirhead for Against All Odds, a biography of Louis Rasminsky.

Poets Seymour Mayne and B. Glen Rotchin are being recognized for A Rich Garland, a collection of poetic tributes to A.M. Klein. They will share the poetry prize with Malca Janice Litovitz, whose recent poetry collection is called To Light, To Water.

Holocaust historians Naomi Kramer and Ronald Headland are being recognized for The Fallacy of Race and the Shoah; the late Arthur Schaller for his memoir, 100 Cigarettes and a Bottle of Vodka; Biblical scholar Adele Reinhartz for Why Ask My Name?: Anonymity and Identity in Biblical Narrative; and Shlomo Zalman Elazar Grafstein for Judaism's Bible: A New and Expanded Translation.

Sara Silberstein Swartz and Margie Wolfe are being honoured for their edition of From Memory to Transformation: Jewish Women's Voices; as is Yiddish poet Simcha Simchovitch for his volume of translations of his own poetry, The Remnant.

A reception with refreshments follows the awards ceremony. The evening is free and the public is invited. Leah Posluns Theatre, 4588 Bathurst St. June 7, 7:30 p.m.

Oil pastel by Peter John Gottlieb.

Mother and Son: European-born and trained artist Erika Simon Gottlieb and her Canadian-born son, Peter John Gottlieb, share the family name and a passion for colour and experimentation with styles. But their canvases are markedly different.

Peter's oil pastels and graphics represent a surreal vision that combines elements of German expressionism and Canadian native art with vivid colours and Gen-X attitude. Erika's oils and water-colours, meanwhile, are distinguished by love of nature and psychological portraiture.

Their joint exhibition runs May 25 to June 29. York Reception Centre, 1100 Millwood Rd. 416-486-7970.

At the Galleries:

TV special chronicles Reichmann saga

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

The reclusive Reichmanns will be coming into living rooms across the country May 29 at 9:00 pm. when Global Television broadcasts a two-hour documentary on the Orthodox family that built one of the largest real estate empires in the world.

Faith and Fortune: The Reichmann Story is directed, written and produced by Montreal independent filmmaker and television producer Alan Handel. The film is based on an award-winning book by Anthony Bianco, a senior writer for Business Week magazine, which is based in New York.

The film, which documents the rise and fall of the family's real estate empire, focuses on the enigmatic character of Paul Reichmann, the current patriarch, who risked the family fortune on the Canary Wharf development in London. The family lost $10 billion and was ruined financially – at least, temporarily.

The film, like the book, was not authorized by the family.

The documentary features interviews with more than 30 people, but none with any of the Reichmanns. However, Philip Reichmann, the son of Paul's brother Albert, helped arrange certain interviews.

"For a long time, I hoped Paul would participate…he had been interviewed for the book. I'm not entirely sure why he didn't," Handel said.

"He may not have been entirely happy with things in the book, or more likely he is not totally comfortable in the medium of television, something he probably has not watched a lot of.

"I tell the story as I see it...I believe it is accurate, incisive and independent. I'm not looking for the approval of Reichmann or to get into trouble."

That's an allusion to the hefty lawsuit the Reichmanns brought against Toronto Life in 1987.

Handel believes that article was wrong in suggesting Paul's parents Renee and Samuel had questionable dealings with the Nazis while they were living in Tangier, Morocco, but he does not shy away from dealing with the topic.

Samuel became wealthy as a currency trader in Tangier, a free-for-all international zone, Handel said. "There's no question there was a flight of capital from Europe during the war, and that money was laundered, which was illegal by the laws of the country it left, but it was legal in Tangier. Whether it was moral is another question."

Handel said he has the highest regard for Renee, whom he credits with heroically saving thousands of Jews from the Holocaust by obtaining exit visas. It is true, he said, that she dealt with the Red Cross of Spain, an ally of Germany, but only for the purpose of getting food parcels into the concentration camps.

Handel said he is fascinated by the Reichmanns' determination to maintain their strict, religious life, including its insularity, while becoming fabulously rich in the New World. Paul actually trained as a rabbi.

"Unlike the Rothschilds, Warburgs and other great Jewish families, the Reichmanns resisted assimilation and never modified their fundamentalist adherence to Jewish law."

TRAVEL TALK

VOLUNTEERS REQUIRED AT ARCHEOLOGICAL DIG

When David slew Goliath, neither combatant could have realized that Canadian volunteers would excavate the historical remains of Goliath's home town one day.

The Philistine city of Gath lies in central Israel, between Jerusalem and Ashkelon. Tel Es-Safi is an archeological hill at Gath, which hides the ruins of several civilizations, and which is due to be the focus of a dig this summer.

Despite intense archeological interest in Gath, little is known about the city that Goliath called home. It is believed to have been the most important of Philistine towns.

Excavations at Gath began in 1997, and have already revealed a huge trench surrounding the town, which was likely built for military purposes.

Aren Maeir, a professor at Bar Ilan University in Tel Aviv, is directing this year's dig at Gath with the assistance of Carl Ehrlich, a professor at York University, Toronto. Scheduled for July 23 to August 18, the work is expected to uncover more information about Philistine life and the two Iron Ages from the 12th to the 8th centuries BCE.

The project has been set up as a credit course at both universities, and volunteers are being sought.

Volunteers (minimum age 16, with parental consent) receive room and board in comfortable facilities, plus trips to adjacent sites. The fee is $1,500 US. Participants are responsible for their own health insurance and a return ticket to Israel.

For more information on the Goliath dig, contact Prof. Ehrlich at 416-736-2100, ext. 77097, or e-mail ehrlich@yorku.ca.

Volunteers are also sought for other archeological projects in Israel. For details contact the Israel Government Tourist Office, 416-964-3784.

Jewish Museum: New York's Jewish Museum is hosting a comprehensive exhibition of the work of Berlin-born Anni Albers (1899-1994), a major textile designer of the 20th century. The show includes more than 200 works, including 25 weavings as well as a broad range of drapery materials, wall coverings, fabric swatches, jewelry designs and drawings. Also on view is Albers' late masterpiece, Six Prayers, a memorial to the victims of the Holocaust. May 28 thru Aug. 20.

Continuing at the museum are exhibitions about Jewish artists working in Paris in the first third of the 20th century, and a children's exhibit about late-19th-century Jewish life in two distinct locales – the Lower East Side of New York, and Persia (now Iran). The museum's core exhibition, Culture and Continuity, was recently reinstalled on the fourth floor.

Spring rekindles fan's love affair with baseball

By HARVEY ROSEN
Special to The CJN

WINNIPEG — I can't specifically recall when the love affair began, but it was perhaps around Grade 6 or 7.

For me, there was always a certain charm about Major League Baseball. Then again, it may have been that the opening of the season in early April was a harbinger of spring. The snow melted and the temperatures began their slow upward climb. On the other hand, it may have been my affection for statistics.

Hank Greenberg was before my time, but for obvious reasons I recall well third baseman Al "Flip" Rosen of the Cleveland Indians. And what Jewish kid didn't delight in the pitching of ex-Dodger left-hander Sandy Koufax, who was recently named favourite athlete of the 20th century by Sports Illustrated. And the furore when in 1965 Koufax refused to pitch the series opener because it was Yom Kippur. Not to mention his last six seasons when he compiled a 129-47 record and a sparkling 2.19 ERA.

These payers, had they been born in the '70s or '80s, would have commanded astronomical salaries. Which brings me to one Shawn David Green. The 27-year-old rightfielder, traded in the off-season by the Toronto Blue Jays to the Los Angeles Dodgers, is locked into a pact with the California club for six years at $14 million per season.

The $84-million contract is the fourth largest in baseball. Will it put pressure on Green? Last year the Dodgers, with one of the highest payrolls in baseball, finished the season at 77-85, 23 games back of the division-winning Arizona Diamondbacks.

The Dodgers presume the Jewish kid will bring some of the bat that banged out 42 homers, drove in 123 runs and produced a .309 batting average.

For the Jays, it was the most reluctant trade of all. But if a man doesn't want to work for your firm, then it's best that there be a parting of the ways.

One L.A. paper wrote following the swap: "For someone who had not had a bar mitzvah and does not attend services, Shawn had declared he would sign only with a team in a city with a large Jewish population."

The winner of the 1999 Golden Glove Award, after making only a single error last season, added that if it became a question of playing on Yom Kippur, like Koufax, he more than likely won't play – not for reasons of personal religious conviction, but to make a statement.

If L.A.'s current record is any indication of Dodger depth, then Green won't likely have to test his Jewish allegiance any time soon.

Another Jewish ballplayer under the microscope in the new millennium will doubtless be outfielder Gabe Kapler, acquired in the off-season by the Texas Rangers from Detroit in a blockbuster nine-player transaction.

Kapler, 24, formerly named Minor League Player of the Year by Baseball Weekly and USA Today, was only moderately successful in his rookie season with Detroit. He hit .245, banged out 18 homers and drove in 49 runs.

Seen as a replacement in right field for departed Ranger slugger Juan Gonzalez, Gabler has large shoes to fill. Gonzalez checked in last year with .326-39-128, the kind of numbers that open franchise vaults.

The rightfielder's family is Conservative, although Christmas was celebrated until he was nine. Attendance at Hebrew school followed shortly thereafter.

For the record, Kapler's claim to fame thus far is that he stole the final base ever at venerable Tiger Stadium on Sept. 27, 1999, before the team moved to its new downtown location.

Brad Ausmus, 31, whose mom is Jewish, is a mainstay with Detroit. The swift catcher (12 stolen bases) hit .275 last season, smacked nine homers and drove in 59 runs. His real forte is defence, having committed only two errors last year. His .998 fielding average led major league receivers. Not to mention his six triples. Brad was rewarded with a spot on the all-star team as a result.

Phillie catcher Mike Lieberthal, who has a Jewish dad, is only 28 and is a rising star. Also a Golden Glove winner in the NL last season, he hit .300, drove in 96 runs and set a record for Philadelphia catchers with 31 taters.

Scott Radinsky (Jewish mom) will be back as a middle reliever with the Cardinals. The hurler, who has overcome cancer, was 2-1 with an ERA of 4.88 in '99. The 32-year-old registered three saves before undergoing arthroscopic surgery in late July to remove bone chips from his left elbow.

Al Levine, 32, is being counted on again in the bullpen by the Anaheim Angels. He's a keeper with a 3.39 ERA in 85 innings and a 1-1 record.

On the cusp and names to watch in the future are David Newhan, a second baseman with San Diego; catcher Jesse Levis, making a bid with Cleveland; journeyman shortstop Eddie Zosky with the Brewers; and Dan Cey (son of Ron, an ex-Dodger and ex-Cub) in the Twins organization.

There is, incidentally, a bumper crop of Jewish minor leaguers ready to make the leap to the majors.

Now, bring on the best of all seasons.

Wartime broadcast imagines life in Nazi-occupied Canada

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Canada lies prostrate under the Nazi heel. The swastika flies from the Peace Tower in Ottawa. Deutschland über Alles – the anthem of Adolf Hitler's Germany – is played at Toronto City Hall. Women are shipped off to Gestapo labour camps.

What gives?

If you were listening to J. Frank Willis' 1942 Canadian Broadcasting Corporation radio series, Nazi Eyes On Canada, you might think that the unthinkable – the German invasion and occupation of Canada – had come to pass. "What couldn't happen has happened," we're told in melodramatic tones.

The five plays, featuring an all-star, dulcet-voiced cast led by Orson Welles, Helen Hayes and Vincent Price, were based on reports written by Colin Ross, a German spy who travelled through Canada on a reconnaissance mission in the 1930s.

Broadcast during the darkest days of World War II, when German armies were on the march in Europe and North Africa, Nazi Eyes On Canada was part drama and part propaganda. It was ultimately designed to stiffen Canadians' resolve in the face of German military victories and to raise money for Canadian war bonds. In the words of a stentorian narrator, "We won't win the war unless we put all efforts into winning it."

Now the plays, whose running time is two-and-a-half hours, are available on two audio cassettes released by a Toronto company, Scenario Productions.

The first one, turning on the Welch family of Toronto, incorporates a speech made to the nation by former prime minister W.L. Mackenzie King a week before Nazi Eyes On Canada was aired. Denouncing Germany's "lust for conquest," King declared that its satanic objective was "to possess the world's soul."

The Welches, a typical middle-class WASP family of the era, are crushed by the weight of Germany's occupation. Joe, a demobilized soldier, is sent off to Germany to work in the mines. One of his beautiful sisters is dispatched to an Aryan breeding camp. "There is no future and hope anymore," wails her distraught mother. Weigmann, a Nazi administrator, retorts, "There is no place for silly sentiments in the new order."

The second episode, which takes place on an Alberta ranch owned by John and Cora Stevenson, emphasizes the theme of betrayal amid the spectre of a family breakup.

Dresser, the local Nazi heavy, requisitions the Stevensons' cattle, horses and grain. And in a final indignity, he places their 11-year-old daughter, Rosemary, under his protection. Thoroughly brainwashed by Nazi teachers, Rosemary turns against her parents.

Meanwhile, brave Canadian ranchers retreat to redoubts in the Rocky Mountains. They return as guerrilla fighters, blowing up oil wells. As the play ends, Canada's finance minister urges Canadians to fight with their hearts and souls to defeat Germany.

In the next play, the focus shifts to Sandy Smith and his family, residents of a town in the Maritimes. They, too, resist the predatory Nazis.

The subsequent play is set in Vancouver, and focuses on an imaginary takeover of British Columbia by Japan, Germany's Axis ally. Bob Maxwell, a solid, patriotic citizen, battles the sly and contemptible Hadaka, an ethnic Japanese fisherman who collaborates with Japan.

The last play unfolds in the prairies. German panzer divisions have overrun Canada and the Luftwaffe has rained death and destruction on Canadian cities.

If nothing else, Nazi Eyes On Canada reminds us of a perilous time when western civilization hung in the balance.

About Life

Dear Ella,

My boyfriend is Jewish and I am not. His parents have a real problem with our relationship. I was raised in a home where only my father was Jewish and I have always considered converting. Now that I have met a man I care for, I feel the time is right.

His parents are against our relationship. They don't want to know anything about me because they can't seem to get past the fact that I am not Jewish. They have told my boyfriend they do not want to meet me.

I'm not sure how to handle this situation. Any help would be appreciated.

Conversion Crossroads

Dear Conversion Crossroads,

You have a fair amount of soul searching ahead of you. Converting to Judaism is a major commitment, one that cannot be made on a whim.

I know you feel it would be easier in many ways if you converted. Your boyfriend's parents would accept you, your relationship would be religiously united and if you had children, they would be raised with a clear religious identity.

It all sounds great on the surface; however, you have to give some thought to what it means to be a Jew. Put everything else aside. Think and learn about the commitment of becoming a Jew.

Do you want to be converted by an Orthodox, Conservative or Reform rabbi? Do you know the difference and what it would mean to your life and lifestyle?

I think you need to do some research before you begin on your road to conversion. There are many books available on the subject and many rabbis with whom you could speak. This is a life-altering decision you are about to make. Don't make it lightly and don't be pressured into making it for anyone but yourself.

As far as your boyfriend's parents, I feel this is his problem to handle. He needs to explain to them what is going on and the difficult decision you are trying to make. With patience and time, they may come around.

Good luck.

In 113 years of safety leadership, this is possibly our finest 2.7 seconds.

► M-CLASS. In 1886, after giving the world the automobile, Mercedes-Benz set out on a century of innovation, with safety at the top of our priorities.

► Imagine our pride then, when, out of fifteen midsize SUV's crash-tested by the Insurance Institute for Highway Safety, the Mercedes M-Class received the highest overall rating: the "Best Pick" commendation.

► In the exceptionally demanding 40 mph (64 km/h) frontal offset crash test, which closely reflects serious, real-world frontal collisions, no vehicle scored higher than the M-Class.

► The M-Class was praised by the Institute for how well the passenger compartment was preserved with little or no intrusion. In part, this is thanks to the M-Class' special, additional crumple zone around the windshield pillars, which can actually help dissipate some of the crash energy around the side of the vehicle.

► In fact, the crumple zone, ABS and the airbag are just some of the many Mercedes-Benz innovations that became industry standards. Proven time and again, these innovations help make the M-Class, with more safety systems than any other SUV, the safety leader it is.

Israel Funwalk 2000

Weizman resigns

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — President Ezer Weizman informed Prime Minister Ehud Barak last week that he will resign from his post by July 10 or 11 at the latest.

Knesset Speaker Avraham Burg told Ha'aretz that the Knesset would elect a new president in a secret vote on Aug. 1. Burg will serve as acting president until a new president is elected, in accordance with Israeli law.

Weizman decided to resign after Attorney General Elyakim Rubinstein and State Prosecutor Edna Arbel issued a report last week indicating that Weizman had behaved in an improper manner by accepting more than $300,000 from businessmen Edouard Saroussi and Rami Ungar while serving as an MK and cabinet minister.

Barak said last Sunday that he would support "[Shimon] Peres." The Likud party has nominated MK Moshe Katzav for the presidency.

Both sides in the race say that the outcome of the race between Katzav and Peres depends on how Shas votes.

The Likud is claiming that they have already won support from United Torah Judaism for Katzav, and that some Arab MKs have secretly promised that they will back Katzav.

Rikudiyah marks 1,000 years of Yiddish

Teme Kernerman

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Teme Kernerman didn't expect an armload of roses at last week's Rikudiyah, but in a surprise tribute, 30 youngsters presented her with a single rose each, symbolizing her 30 years of organizing the annual Israeli dance festival for children.

This year's Rikudiyah, held on Lag b'Omer at York University's Tait McKenzie Gymnasium, featured 289 dancers between the ages of eight and 12, representing 15 Jewish schools, including the Hamilton Hebrew Academy. The other schools are based in the Toronto area.

"To see young Jewish children dancing on Lag b'Omer is the best sign of creativity and growth in our community," said Seymour Epstein, director of the Board of Jewish Education, which co-sponsored the event along with the Koffler Centre of the Arts-Bathurst Jewish Centre, where Kernerman is based.

The gym reverberated with the sound of Yiddish music — songs like Az Der Rebbe Zingt and Alle Brider — as children from all the schools danced simultaneously in individual circles. To explain the theme of this year's Rikudiyah, Kernerman noted that just as Lag b'Omer marks a story of survival in the pages of Jewish history, so has the Yiddish language survived. It is now experiencing a strong revival, she added. Thus, Rikudiyah 2000 celebrated its own 30th anniversary as well as 1,000 years of Yiddish. All the dances were set to Yiddish music and participants were taught some of the dances and lyrics to the song Ot Azoi, performed by the Hot Latkes Klezmer band.

The Chai Dancers, Kernerman's dance group for seniors, opened the program with a dance called Shtetel Sher. Sher, explained Kernerman, is the Yiddish word for scissors. The dance, influenced by the French quadrille, depicts the movements of a tailor's scissors with its crossing motions.

Later in the program, the younger participants echoed the opening with a variation called Sherele, in which a line of dancers snakes through itself to simulate the threading of a needle.

"It's really a tricky formation," said Kernerman.

Newspaper article angers Hamilton Jews

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — An article in the Hamilton Spectator that criticizes Jews and Israel for allegedly ignoring the suffering of genocide victims has angered the city's Jewish community and prompted demands for a meeting with the paper's editors.

The article is "factually wrong," "verges on a diatribe" and is "a slap in the face" to the Jews of Hamilton, said Patricia Tolkin Eppel, executive director of the Jewish Federation of Hamilton. "The whole thing was rife with inaccuracies, but it's the tone that worries me more."

Tolkin Eppel said the article "underplayed true Jewish emotions about the Holocaust and is dismissive."

Kirk LaPointe, editor in chief of the Spectator, said, "There's no question I feel no small piece of contrition over the way the article was phrased."

LaPointe acknowledged that "there are aspects of the article that didn't work," but he said the paper did not intend to offend the Jewish community.

"It's not in our demeanour or value system to offend either directly or through code language," he said. The author of the piece is "mortified" at the response it has generated, but LaPointe maintained the term "holocaust" was a legitimate subject for debate.

The article, by Neville Newman, a teacher who serves as a member of the Spectator's community editorial board, is headed "We need to acknowledge the other holocausts." It refers to the numerous pebbles scattered at Oskar Schindler's memorial tree at Yad Vashem and expresses his "distaste" for the "false emotion born from a Spielberg-inspired hysteria."

> 'Rife with inaccuracies'

He goes on to suggest that "memorials to 'the' Holocaust reiterate in our consciousness the systematic killing of six million Jews while simultaneously reducing, almost to the point of non-existence, the memory of those of other faiths and ethnicities who died along side them, other than, perhaps, by means of a handful of stones tossed, as an afterthought, around a tree somewhere."

Tolkin Eppel said the federation has fielded dozens of calls from readers angry about the article.

A correction published alongside a piece by LaPointe did not go far enough to undo the damage it caused, she said. It corrected one of the article's factual errors – the claim that Israel did nothing to help Rwandan genocide victims – but it omitted reference to the tone of the article and Newman's contention that "the grotesquely politicized suffering that is the Holocaust has made stones of too many Jewish hearts."

The article's dismissive tone rankles Len Rudner, director of community relations for Canadian Jewish Congress.

"How could people not be upset by this? It was horrible," he said. "Newman suggests that Jews are not interested in the suffering of others, that Israel was not interested in Rwanda."

Rudner and Tolkin Eppel said they want to meet with the Spectator's editorial board to discuss the piece and what Tolkin Eppel called "the overall trend that culminated in this article." The paper has run articles from other publications that showed a lack of sensitivity and even-handedness, she contended.

LaPointe rejected that suggestion, saying the paper had run hundreds of articles on the Mideast, and to single out one or two is "tremendously unfair."

He said that "staffing issues at the newspaper worked against a thorough-going edit" of the Newman piece. As a result, it suffered from "inelegant passages, its language was excessive and it had at least one factual error."

But, he added, "I don't think that any piece that could offend people could constitute the general tone of the Hamilton Spectator."

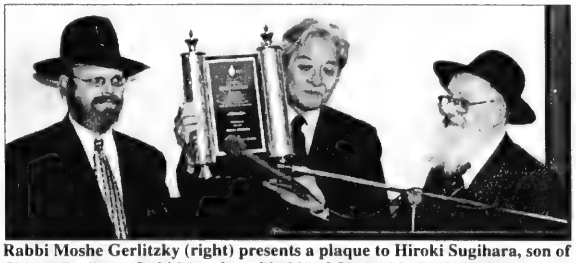
Chabad honours Sugihara

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter



Rabbi Moshe Gerlitzky (right) presents a plaque to Hiroki Sugihara, son of Chiune Sugihara. Rabbi Avraham Plotkin of Chabad Lubavitch of Markham Congregation looks on. [Photo courtesy Chabad Lubavitch of Markham]

TORONTO — At the beginning, there was one man on the bimah, an elderly Japanese. He was joined by another elderly man, a rabbi with a black coat and hat and long white beard. Then four more people came up.

At the end, the bimah was filled with people.

It was a poignant demonstration of the good done by Chiune Sugihara, the Japanese consul in wartime Lithuania. Against the direct orders of the Japanese government, during one month in 1940 he issued transit visas that saved more than 6,000 Jews.

His reward was a humiliating dismissal from his position in the foreign service.

Sugihara, through his son Hiroki, was recently honoured by Chabad Lubavitch of Markham Congregation. Rebbitzen Goldie Plotkin had heard the story of Chiune Sugihara and thought that paying tribute to him would be a fitting Yom Hashoah program.

When she told her grandfather, Rabbi Moshe Gerlitzky, a Holocaust survivor who now lives in Montreal, she was stunned to discover that he had been saved by the Japanese diplomat, and yearned to thank him.

"He asked if he could make the presentation," Plotkin told The CJN.

The rabbi, shaking with emotion, presented Hiroki Sugihara with a scroll in the shape of an open Torah.

The shul's spiritual leader, Rabbi Avraham Plotkin, said people such as Sugihara and Oskar Schindler "didn't just save Jews. They saved our faith in goodness."

Hiroki Sugihara, in a speech punctuated with a dry wit, said he tells his father's story in the hope that people, especially children, will learn that "one person can make a difference, if [he or she has] the courage to stand on principle. One person can be a force in stemming evil."

Chiune Sugihara, his son said, was a career diplomat in Japan's foreign service. He saved his country millions of dollars when he discovered that "Russia was trying to sell them the Northern Manchuria railroad for five times its worth."

After serving in Helsinki for two years, he was assigned to Kaunas (Kovno), Lithuania. Ten months later, in July 1940, all the consulates were ordered to close.

Towards the end of July, hundreds of Jews began to hammer on the doors of the Japanese consulate, asking for help. "They realized that their only safety was to escape from Lithuania through Russia and Siberia, to Japan."

Sugihara realized that "he was the only one who could make the decision on whether to follow Japanese orders, or to follow humanitarian principles."

With the encouragement of his wife, Hiroki said, from July 27 until the end of August, Chiune Sugihara signed 200 to 300 transit visas a day, 2,139 in all.

Ironically, after the war, the Sugihara family itself became refugees, interned by the Russians for a year and a half.

When they finally returned to Japan, Chiune Sugihara was told he had to resign from the foreign service, as he had disobeyed direct orders.

For some time, the family lived in relative poverty, with Chiune working as an interpreter, translator and a teacher. "For a time, he peddled light bulbs door to door. He gave up after a week. We didn't buy light bulbs for five years."

Even through his humiliation at the loss of his career, Hiroki said, "he never expressed regret" at what he had done.

It is thought that there are now between 40-60,000 Jews in the world because of Chiune Sugihara's selfless act.

From the Editor's Desk will return next week.

CJC lashes out at Ecker's remarks on funding

TORONTO — The Ontario region of Canadian Jewish Congress has used some of the strongest language in memory in response to comments made recently by Education Minister Janet Ecker.

In response to a set-up question from fellow Tory MPP Jerry Ouelette on the government's commitment to public education, Ecker referred to last February's United Nations decision which found that Ontario discriminates against Jews and other minority religions by funding Catholic schools and not other faith-based education systems.

"Our commitment to public education is very clear," Ecker stated May 17 during question period. "A publicly funded education system, one that has higher standards, better quality, more accountability, is very important, very much a building block for not only our economic prosperity in this province, but also our success as a society and our quality of life.

"When we were challenged by the United Nations and by the federal Liberals to back off that commitment, we stood firm and said no," Ecker said.

That prompted a tart response from Keith Landy, chair of CJC's Ontario region:

"As a strong supporter of public education in this province I almost found myself rising to my feet to applaud your May 17 statement in the Legislature: 'When we were challenged by the United Nations and by the federal Liberals to back off that commitment (to public education), we stood firm and said no.' I said almost because behind your Churchillian steadfastness lies some remarkable misunderstanding and misrepresentations.

"Allow me to restate your remark: 'When we were challenged by the United Nations and by the federal Liberals to stop being the only jurisdiction to publicly fund the schools of one religious denomination and not those of other religious denominations, we stood firm and said no.'

Landy invites minister to meet

"Doesn't sound so good now does it? But that is precisely what your government did.

"The perpetuation of this offensive policy (state-sponsored religious discrimination) is, again and again, justified by you as necessary to defend public education in this province. As if public education was threatened in all those other jurisdictions which provide public support to religiously based independent schools.

"Let me repeat what I have said to you over and over again. No one has asked you to take $ 300 million out of the public education system in order to eliminate this blatant discrimination. The amount of money in question is only about one half of one percent of the total provincial budget. In light of the fact that provincial finances are now moving into a surplus, this must surely allow your government the opportunity to make new allocations without cutting into existing budgets.

"Madame Minister, as minister of education, surely you have the responsibility and mandate to represent the public at large. [Some members] of your public attend non-Catholic religious schools and don't enjoy being treated as second class citizens. No amount of 'tough talk' in the legislature against the perceived dangers of the United Nations and the federal Liberals will ever let you escape from the fundamental injustice which you seem so determined to perpetuate.

"Allow me once again to invite you to meet with representatives of the Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario Region to discuss the ways and means by which your government can end this discrimination immediately," Landy's letter stated.

NYGH's Branson division moving to more ambulatory care

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Branson Division of North York General Hospital (NYGH) will continue to reorganize its services this summer and strengthen its ambulatory care services, a meeting of the executive of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region was told last week.

The number of beds will be up slightly, day surgery will continue to be offered, urgent care for walk-in patients will be available and ambulatory care will be stressed at the new, revamped Branson, said Murray MacKenzie, president and CEO of North York General.

MacKenzie, along with NYGH vice-president Dianne Anderson, briefed the executive on changes at Branson, which was taken over by NYGH in 1998 as part of the restructuring of health services mandated by the provincial government.

In the next three to four months, Branson will offer more outpatient services and it will shift its ambulatory care services from the Leslie/Sheppard site to the Branson site at Finch and Bathurst, MacKenzie said.

By August, Branson will no longer receive patients who arrive in ambulances, though 95 percent of its emergency services will continue to be offered. By September all the ophthalmology services as well as many other surgical procedures will move to Branson, he said.

The centrepiece of the changes forecast for Branson is its planned ambulatory care centre that will provide comprehensive health services for area residents. The idea behind the centre is to treat patients, many of them seniors, during the day and allow them to return to their own homes at night.

The ambulatory services that will be available to patients include: health education; cardiology and respiratory services; rehabilitation; diagnostic imaging; surgical/endoscopy suite; and laboratory services.

MacKenzie said 98 interim long-term beds in Finch Villa, which is part of Branson, will continue to operate at least until 2002.

Identifying health problems early on is a key component of the ambulatory centre, MacKenzie said. The centre's primary care service will see teams of health professionals, including doctors, nurses and social workers, identify areas of concern and refer patients to the appropriate care.

A seniors' wellness program is designed to provide outreach to elderly patients, provide home care and community support services. The hospital will work in conjunction with Jewish social service agencies, and organizations from other communities, to treat patients, Anderson said.

Currently, NYGH is mandated to provide medical services as far west as Keele Avenue, but it hasn't had the resources to provide services beyond Yonge. It now appears that more public funds from both the provincial and federal governments may allow the hospital to expand its services to the west, she said.

MacKenzie said he expects construction to begin in two to three years on a facility that will house 151 long-term care beds.

Basherte workshop set

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Singles of all ages will have a chance to meet their soul mates at this week-end's Basherte workshop, sponsored by Kolel, the Adult Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning.

The workshop, in Toronto for the first time, was created by Efraim and Rosalie Eisen, in order to bring Jewish singles together and to enhance Jewish identity, relationships and knowledge of Jewish spirituality. It is intended for singles from all levels of Jewish observance, from the unaffiliated to modern Orthodox.

The Basherte workshop is an opportunity for singles who are "spiritual seekers and looking to grow personally, to meet others who are also spiritually sensitive, serious Jews," says Rabbi Neal Loevinger, head of Kolel's department of outreach.

Ideal mates, he says, will share the same values. By attending the workshop, singles will gain a clearer idea of what is important to them, "based on their own spiritually Jewish commitment. There are many different ways to be Jewish, and in part of the workshop, participants will discover where they are in their Jewish journey, and what kind of person they want to travel along with them," says Rabbi Loevinger.

It is also a chance to think about their own vision of a soul mate, he said, whether it is someone to share such ideals as a commitment to social action, or a traditional Jewish home.

The workshop at Kolel will take place in three parts over the course of the weekend, with an option for just the first section. There may be times when smaller groups are formed with the intent of allowing those of similar ages and backgrounds a chance to interact and meet each other.

For information, call Kolel at 416-485-7007.

Rabbi Marcus honoured for 20 years of service

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO – When Rabbi Raphael Marcus reluctantly agreed to be honoured for serving 20 years as spiritual leader of B'nai Torah Congregation, he gave strict orders about the gifts he expected (none) and the praise that would be given him (also none).

To his obvious embarrassment, but to the delight of the audience, both directions were ignored.

Nearly 500 people attended the tribute dinner, which was held at the Regency Ballroom in Woodbridge.

Also honoured was Harry Guest, who received the synagogue's community service award for his efforts to make kosher food more accessible to the Toronto kosher consumer.

Rabbi Shmuel Marcus, the rabbi's son, acknowledged that "it is futile to ask my father to talk [about himself]." He praised him for being able to understand each individual, and being able to relate in the most appropriate manner.

A teenager who had gone to him for some help described him as "so cool," Shmuel said.

He is concerned with people's feelings, and is able to empathize with them, said Shmuel, likening it to "putting on and taking off other people's clothes."

As well, he works with "those unfortunate people who are rejected by others – the homeless, those in prison."

Shmuel said that the kindness shown by his father, and by his mother Rochel Leah, are legion, from allowing someone who had been evicted to sleep on their couch, to abandoning a vacation when a member of the congregation was seriously or fatally, ill, to always being available to their children.

Synagogue president Jay Shiel praised Rabbi and Rebbetzen Marcus for their commitment to teaching, and as role models in kibud av v'aim (honoring parents) and child rearing.

Shiel noted that when Rabbi Marcus became aware that there were homeless Jewish children in the area, he proposed letting them sleep in the shul. "When I said that we would have to have a security guard or a social worker there, he said that he himself would stay with them," Shiel remembered.

B'nai Torah's good name in the community is "entwined with that of Rabbi Marcus," Shiel said.

Dinner chair, Jack Kahn, said that the organizing committee had followed the rabbi's injunction to "not give gifts of gold or silver." Instead, they gave the couple tickets "to visit their children in Israel."

Rabbi Marcus, who playfully threatened to tell the truth about "the real Rabbi Marcus" during his next three sermons,said that his rebbetzen fully deserved being honoured. "It is on her back I can be shlepped along."

Guest was praised by his daughter, Symee Citron, as being largely responsible for the development of the Clark and Hilda IGA store. It is the only supermarket in North America to have such an extensive kosher grocery selection, which includes a complete bakery, prepared food, deli, fish, cheese, and fresh meat departments.

Citron said that he has "earned the respect of his family, friends and colleagues."

Guest, who will be 80 in two weeks, she said, was also active in UJA FEDERATION, Jewish National Fund, and with the Variety Club.

Rabbi Marcus, describing Guest's work as an economic consultant to many foreign countries, said that he "is a model in spreading goodwill as an ambassador for our great country."

Guest was presented with a plaque by Rabbi Yitzchok Kerzner and Mordechai Levin of the Kashruth Council (COR), and with the community service award by Gary Diamond and Howard Kurlandski.

CCFC Wheel-a-Thon

TORONTO — Elliott Gordon, a 12-year-old who has Crohn's disease is this year's honorary chair of Crohn's and Colitis Foundation's (CCFC) Heel 'n' Wheel-a-Thon.

Rain or shine, the Heel 'n' Wheel-a-thon will take place Sunday, June 11, at Toogood Pond Park, Unionville, with a kick-off at approximately 11 a.m.

Participants of all ages are invited to walk, bike, run, in-line skate, walk the dog, or even skip to help find the cure for Crohn's disease and ulcerative colitis, two prevalent forms of inflammatory bowel disease (IBD).

Elliott has an amazing outlook on his condition and has worked hard to get people to understand the nature of his illness. He was also last year's honorary chair of the annual Heel 'n' Wheel-a-Thon.

IBD is a term used to describe two similar, yet distinct conditions: Crohn's disease and ulcerative colitis. These diseases affect the digestive system and cause the intestines to become inflamed.

No one knows what causes IBD. It affects people regardless of race, gender or age. People are most frequently diagnosed between the ages of 15 and 25 years or 45 and 55 years.

This family oriented day promises to be one of fun and awareness. Last year, in York Region, the goal of $13,000 was surpassed and more than $26,000 was raised towards finding the cure for IBD.

Rocket Richard

His name alone was an alliterative force. While he played the game, his name evoked the image of sheer power, of speed and strength, of courage and raw will. And even after he played his last, it evoked those defining memories of a rare human being, whose every turn on a sheet of ice could rouse a crowd like the moon pulling on the waves of the ocean.

For the Rocket, the game was never simply a game, but rather a highly personalized statement about life: each game, like each day, too precious to squander through indifference, complacency or defeatism. The game was never simply about winning for its own sake, but rather about winning for the sake of his cause – his team, his teammates and the millions upon millions of fans and believers who trusted their hopes to him. The fire in his eyes burned for his cause: them. And they, his fans – Montrealers, Quebecers, Canadians – with reciprocal love, adored him to the very last day of his life, last Saturday.

The unknown soldiers

Last Sunday, so fitting and so poignant was the place that Canadians designated as the new memorial to the more than 27,000 Canadian soldiers who fell in wars this century and are buried, if at all, somewhere in unmarked graves. Their burial marker is now, appropriately, at home, in Ottawa. It acknowledges that only their graves are unknown, but not their lives, cut down before their time, or our everlasting gratitude.

Yom Yerushalayim

And at sundown tonight, Thursday evening, the Jewish people commemorate the reunification of Jerusalem. There are forces in the world that would divide that city once again. We must resist that with all our power and we must set aside at least a few moments on the 28th day of Iyar to recall that special time in our history some 33 years ago, to share the recollection with our children and to express our thanks that we have lived to see such wonderful things unfold for us, for the Jewish people and for the world.

ON TRIAL IN IRAN

The trial of the 13 Iranian Jews on charges of espionage resumed behind closed doors on May 1. Each of the accused has a name. Let us not forget them.

When tradition is misrepresented

While Jean M. Gerber's sentiments about the inclusion of all Jews in our holy people may be laudable (CJN, May 4), she seems not to have very carefully read the Agudath Israel advertisement in the New York Times that she criticizes.

Our ad in no way disowned anyone from the Jewish people. It was simply a clear statement about the Reform movement's rabbinic group's public and loud proclamation to the world that they consider same-sex relationships Jewishly unobjectionable.

Agudath Israel has no interest in gratuitously criticizing other Jews, even when they do outrageous things. But we do have a clear and strong mandate to speak up when the Jewish religious tradition – the tradition that lies at the roots of all Jews, whether they choose to accept it or not – is misrepresented, and especially if its misrepresenters are Jewish clergy.

And so, we felt we had no choice but to declare, in the same sphere where the CCAR decision had been highlighted, the fact that the Torah forbids homosexual acts in no uncertain terms. Our ad did not throw anyone out of the Jewish people; what it did was offer accurate information and a phone number to an independent hotline that helps Jews find Jewish educational opportunities in their communities.

Among the Jews Gerber includes in her list of Jews are members of the "Israeli mafia." One imagines that, all the same, she still feels free to condemn murder.

A call for aid to the SLA

I was deeply saddened by the early pictures coming in from the Israeli-Lebanese border. The pictures at the border, also known as "the Good Fence," showed thousands of South Lebanese Army (SLA) refugees pleading for refuge in northern Israel, from the imminent Hezbollah revenge attacks.

All Israelis, Jews, Zionists, post-Zionists and humanists, have an obligation to help these "sitting ducks." As Hezbollah guerrillas continue their consolidation of former Israeli outposts, the SLA will come under threat of brutality and possibly execution.

Lebanese factions have time and again shown no respect from human life and dignity in the region. Recall the infamous Sabra and Shatilla massacre of 1982, in which Christian Phalangists brutally massacred Palestinian refugees left in the wake of the PLO's retreat.

As a young Jew who has never picked up a weapon in defence of the northern settlement of Israel, and as a Jew who has immense pride in the protection of our lands, I am overwhelmed with guilt at the sealed fate of those who took my place in preserving the peace of the State of Israel.

Although in his recent trip to the region, Jean Chrétien did indicate his willingness to accept Lebanese refugees into Canada, it is an unlikely scenario. Today I call on all of the Jewish communal organizations and congresses, aid agencies and international political forums around the world to help these people begin their new lives.

Whether one agrees with their political stands, which I might add were taken 25 years ago in the midst of a Lebanese civil war in which there were a number of sides fighting each other, we are not dealing only with soldiers from the disbanded SLA, but also with their innocent wives and children.

This is an event that calls for the attention not only of Israeli and Diaspora Jews, but of all those who care for the preservation of human life and dignity.

David Skok

Editor's note: As of this writing, some 6,000 former SLA soldiers and some of their families had found refuge in Israel.

Mistruths on refugees

For example, in a recent report in a national daily newspaper, the number of Arab refugees "driven out of former Palestine" was quoted as 3.5 million. This is a brazen lie! There were never 3.5 million Arabs in the former Palestine!

The number of Arabs in Palestine in the year 1939, according to the gazette published by the British administration under the Mandate, was 741,380. The number of Jews at that time, according to the same official gazette, was 482,000. In 1948 (just prior to the declaration of the Jewish state), the gazette lists 802,442 Arabs and 608,000 Jews.

After UNRA undertook to feed refugees and provide temporary housing and schooling in the refugee camps in Lebanon, Jordan, Gaza and Syria, the original number of approximately 480,000 refugees grew to 3.5 million! How? Very simple! Many Arabs who were not refugees declared that they were, and were accepted in these camps!

I wonder why the present Israeli leaders, who know these facts too, do not unmask the brazen lie behind the refugee claim.

Jerusalem of Gold still golden 33 years later

By SARAH HERSHENSON
WZPS

Naomi Shemer, Israeli composer and lyricist, has written hundreds of songs in her lifetime. Her words and poetry are famous, known and sung around the world. However, the words she wrote for Jerusalem of Gold three weeks before the Six Day War in 1967 were almost prophetic.

In the spring of 1967, Shemer was commissioned to write the song Yerushalayim Shel Zahav (Jerusalem of Gold) for the Israel Song Festival. After the festival and for three weeks before the war, this song, sung by Shuly Natan, became instantly popular and was played constantly on the radio. Then the Six Day War broke out, and Shemer went with the army performance groups to be with the troops.

Naomi Shemer as she looked in the 1960s.

On June 7, the performing group found themselves outside of El Arish waiting for the battle to finish.

"Suddenly," Shemer remembers, "we heard the announcer on the radio informing his listeners that the Old City of Jerusalem had been retaken by the IDF and we could hear people in the background singing my song, Jerusalem of Gold. Two hours later, we were being whisked away to perform for the soldiers and deliver the news, which they had not yet heard, that Jerusalem was a united city.

"I also had my own message to add: during those two hours I had written a fourth stanza to the song, celebrating the fact that Jerusalem was reunited and that other parts of the land, which Jews had longed for for so many years, were now in our hands. I first read the words to the soldiers clearly, like a radio announcer, so that they would be sure to understand, and then sang the song in its completed version."

Since that day, Jerusalem of Gold has functioned almost as a "second" national anthem.

When greeting me at the door of her Tel Aviv apartment, however, Naomi Shemer does not seem like an Israeli legend. Israel's "first lady of Israeli song," Israel Prize winner and recipient of honorary doctorates from many universities, takes my hand, smiles and ushers me into a sunny room filled with the things she loves most: books, a piano, music, beautiful quilts made by friends and a child-sized table heaped high with toys for her grandchildren.

Then, in a voice warm with natural musical cadence, she quickly gets down to business. She tells me that she is a pensioner and writes only one or two new songs a year when circumstances call for it, such as the Hebrew version of Captain, My Captain after Yitzhak Rabin's death.

"I don't have the energy I once did," she says matter-of-factly. "The tempo of my life now is very easy and comfortable, with plenty of time for university courses, for grandchildren, to gladly assume the responsibilities of my new appointment as chairman of ACUM [the Israel organization for composers and writers], and as a member of the Academy of Hebrew Language, which is a great honour for me.

"However," she continues with good humour, "even when I am passive, my mind still works! Over the years, I have become a master of perfecting the state of 'intensive idleness.' This has been and will always be my way of life."

Then without missing a beat, Shemer tells of her new show. "It is a collection of my songs spanning many years," she explains enthusiastically, "and of course, I have written two new songs for it."

The verses of her two new songs, Actualia and The Coat, reveal Shemer's clear perception of and attitudes towards changing times. Actualia is a direct parody on the changing quality of life in Israel. The Coat surrealistically describes a beautiful coat of many colours which can fly freely over the "colourful patchwork quilt" view on the ground, and is oblivious to the coloured lines that allude to the colours of Israeli army maps.

Shemer herself does not like boundaries, since she grew up at a time in Israel where there were no boundaries or cement barricades.

"Before 1948, people travelled freely to Jordan, Lebanon and the Hermon," she recalls. "However, after the War of Independence, the barricades, which divided Jerusalem and the entire country into a Jordanian side and an Israeli side, bothered my generation very much.

"Between 1948 and 1967," Shemer remembers, "we felt that we were in a straightjacket of a narrow country, and we missed very much the feeling of open borders. Then came the days in 1967 before the Six Day War when there was a feeling of tension and excitement in the air. We had no idea about what would actually happen, and afterwards, the happiness was overwhelming."

Throughout the years, Shemer has written hundreds of songs and beautiful melodies that have become part of Israeli musical tradition and folklore. However, she recalls her illustrious career through untinted glasses.

"In 1948, during the War of Independence, I was 17 and on the front line in my kibbutz, Kvutzat Kinneret. Then after the war, I went to the Academy of Music in Jerusalem and received my degree in music education. However in 1952, the army realized I had not served regular duty. They drafted me and sent me to the cultural division of Nahal. I served with fine people like Chaim Topol, who would later give me the opportunity to write songs that would start me on my way to becoming a professional song writer. But while I was in the army, life was a challenge.

"You have to understand," she continues with eyes full of mischief. "I was a bad soldier and was regularly sent on punishment duty to distant places that had no running water or electricity. But I certainly saw different parts of the country that way, and later would write about them."

And so it follows that many of Naomi Shemer's songs cover the topography of Eretz Yisrael. Others speak of love, friendship, love of Israel and a myriad of topics that run the gamut in style, subject, mood and tempo.

"It is very important to me," she says, "that each song has a character of his own."

Many of her songs speak about the beauty of the Kinneret. When asked why, she smiles as she remembers her youth.

"I was born on Kvutzat Kinneret. My parents Rivka and Meir Sapir were from Vilna and came to Israel in the wave of the third aliyah. They helped build the kibbutz with their own hands. I remember my father as a warm, loving, funny person. He was the last commander in 1948 during Operation Bricha, which was the evacuation of the Jews of Europe from the camps to Palestine. My mother was in charge of my music education, and to her I owe all my professional skills."

After her IDF service, Shemer returned to Kvutzat Kinneret as a music teacher in the kindergarten.

"There were few Hebrew songs for toddlers about kibbutz life at the time," she says, "so I wrote my first eight songs for children about life on the kibbutz. Today it makes me happy to know that these songs, such as The Postman Comes in a Red Van, are still known and sung by children throughout the country. These songs are about the life in Kinneret, a wonderful place to grow up. The dearest points in my life happened to me in the kibbutz and therefore, were the first sources of my inspiration."

At the age of 26, Shemer left the kibbutz and went to Tel Aviv with her first husband, Gideon, and their baby daughter Leli. Here she wrote for Chaim Topol.

"After our experiences together in Nahal, he remembered that I could write music as well as poetry. From that point on, I became a professional songwriter. I am lucky to be in Israel which is a happy place for a songwriter. There is a constant demand and we have almost a monopoly on the Hebrew song industry."

Creating the good "marriage" between Hebrew words and music is very important to Shemer. "But needless to say, I want my songs to be sung by non-Hebrew speakers also. Therefore, I have translated the titles to English in my song books, and have also put in a transliterated English version of the Hebrew words under the music."

Shemer's lyrics and poetry are a rich melange of the Hebrew language. When asked why she uses quotes from the Bible and traditional texts, she answers, "When I was a young student, I had two wonderful teachers. We learned all the Israeli poets by heart, as well as many chapters in the Bible, Rashi and other traditional texts. We had a very intimate knowledge of the Bible because of the way it was taught. These words are part of my language and part of my life, and therefore part of my songs."

Although Shemer says that foreign languages are a challenge, it does not stop her from learning and using what she loves. She has translated to Hebrew and set to her own music the words of many French songs and the poetry of the Beatles.

"I love mixing ancient Hebrew and slang. Musical style is always moving forward and so must I. What the next generation of song writers is doing, like my son Ariel Horowitz (who wrote the hit Yalla, Bye), I find very exciting and am all for it. My daughter-in-law, Tamar Giladi, a wonderful singer, just released her first CD, Those Very Days, which also makes me happy."

It is evident that Shemer's home life has been rich in the beauty of music and words. Her husband, Mordechai Horowitz, is a lawyer and writer. Her daughter Leli is a language editor. Shemer herself is adding another language, Italian, to her linguistic inventory.

When asked about new developments in her music and style, Naomi Shemer thinks for a moment and then uses a quote she loves from Lullaby for Sean by John Lennon: "Life is something that happens when we are busy making other plans."

What are her plans for the future? "I am puzzled by the direction or lack of direction in which our lives are moving," she says. "I am full of hopes and fears."

However, one thing that remains a certainty and a constant is her love of the Land, its places of beauty, its cities and Jerusalem of Gold.

Opinions

Opponents of circumcision

A recent article in Commentary called attention to the fact that a fair number of Jews no longer wish to have their male children circumcised. For those of us who consider milah a fundamental precept of Judaism, this is a worrisome development.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

For some decades, North American medical authorities took the position that circumcision was in fact a procedure that should be recommended for all newborn males, for it was seen to have distinctive physical benefits.

Of late, however, the position of the medical establishment has changed, and while circumcision is still a common practice in many hospitals, the medical benefits of the operation are no longer generally accepted.

In fact, there seems to be increasing opposition to the general advisability of having a circumcision done — a movement observable among both gentiles and Jews who consider circumcision to be a purely medical procedure.

They claim that any medical benefits of circumcision are negligible when compared to the child's trauma, which one writer describes as involving "the infant's heart rates, breathing, intensity and duration of crying, consolability, sociability, motor activity, flexion of fingers and toes, and sleep pattern."

All of these consequences are said to arise from the intense pain that the baby suffers at the time of the operation. (Pain is, however, no longer a necessary aspect of milah. No less a halachic and medical authority than Rabbi Moshe Tendler has approved a number of pain depressants.)

In any case, for most Jews, the operation is not to be assessed in terms of medical benefits. It is one of the basic mitzvot of our religion, and for a long time has been observed even by those for whom the concept of mitzvah played a minor role. Being male and Jewish has meant and still means that one has been circumcised shortly after birth.

Still, pessimists foresee the day when a child will sue his parents for having exposed him to a medically unnecessary procedure which resulted in "mutilation." I do not know what the court would decide, but I believe that pessimism is not really warranted. Jews will continue to have their boys circumcised and the exceptions will be relatively few.

I hope my personal optimism will not be contradicted by future developments. For I believe that greater religious commitment is at hand for Jews: We will be more intensely Jewish rather than neglectful of our tradition, and even those who live at the margin of our religious culture will feel that circumcision is one practice that must continue as a common bond.

Thursday's child

What was the world like on my birthday, Thursday, May 9, 1940? I went to the newspapers to find out.

• The *Vancouver Sun: The RAF was struggling to escape from Nazi-occupied Norway. Chamberlain was on his last day as prime minister of England. The United States was chided for refusing to join the war effort. Mussolini was posturing over his invasion of Ethiopia, his green card into the Axis.

Cloth coats sold for $12.95. Jack Benny's latest movie, Buck Benny Rides Again, was playing. Raymond Massey was appearing in Abe Lincoln in Illinois. The Vancouver Maple Leafs won.

Thirty British children arrived to shelter in B.C. homes. (None of them were Jewish orphans, who were barred from entry.)

Butter was 30 cents a pound. Kid gloves for Mom were $2.50 at Woodward's Department Store.

• The *Globe and Mail: War maps were two for 25 cents. Three TB cases had been diagnosed at Parkdale Collegiate in Toronto.

Under the headline, "Keeping Canada British," the editors noted that more Germans immigrated in 1939 to Canada than Scots, Irish or Welsh. "How many of these newcomers from the Fatherland, to which they still owe allegiance, are members of the 'fifth column'?" the editors asked. The largest group were Ruthenians (1,509), the second "Hebrews" (1,321).

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

Of the more than 16,000 immigrants the previous year, they noted, more than 12,000 were non-British. "We are not going to build up a British nation in Canada with Germans, Bohemians, Croatians, Hebrews, Japanese, Magyars, Russians and Ruthenians predominating."

• The *New York Times: The German build-up on the border of Holland, the Dutch envoy to the United States assured America, was not a threat. The editors opined that it could be a "trick" to get French and English troops into the neutral countries of Holland and Belgium.

The pope called on Archangel Michael to preserve world peace. He did not mention Mussolini or the Jews of Catholic countries occupied by Germany (Poland, Czecholslovakia, Austria, France).

On page 10: Thirty-seven refugees, 26 of them "blunt, bronzed young German farmers," had arrived in the Dominican Republic. The Germans, as it turned out, were in fact Jewish refugees. "Although the U.S., with generously interpreted immigration quotas [my emphasis] has done much, the Dominican Republic is the first nation in the world to open land to large [sic] groups of European refugees as permanent settlers and promise them virtually the same rights that are enjoyed by the native born."

Don't get too excited about this generous gift, because as officials noted, "white men have never performed manual labour where these men are going… The land is not the most fertile… [but] the rest depends on [the settlers'] ability, adaptability and industry."

This "Sousa settlement" – sponsored by the American Society for Jewish Farm Settlements in Russia, set up a scheme to bring Jews from Europe under the auspices of the American Jewish Joint Agricultural Corporation.

Whoever they were.

What is missing, with the exception of the last article, from these reports? The situation of the Jews in Europe. Poland was already in the grip of the Germans, and Jews were daily being pushed into the ghettos, shot and deported. The few refugees who made it to the Dominican Republic were no doubt eternally grateful, but the chilling disregard for the Jews is stunning.

In sum, Canada supported the war with men and matériel (military equipment), while steadfastly ignoring Jewish peril, except to bemoan the non-British who had made it to Canada by 1939. Vancouver was blissfully unaware that Jews were in peril at all; and the New York Times, the paper of record, actually allowed itself to praise this feeble rescue effort by imagining that the United States' quota system had done anything but keep Jews out. Instead it praised a dictator's generosity in letting in 37 Jews to be settled on harsh and useless land.

On May 10, Churchill became prime minister of Great Britain. Germany invaded Belgium and Holland. On Sunday, everyone bought flowers and candy for Mothers Day.

Canada Post should learn from Israelis

When I was a lad growing up in Sydney, N.S., I collected stamps. I think I got started when my uncle Gordon gave me a first day of issue stamp and cover for some anniversary of Rotary International. I loved stamp collecting. I learned a lot about our country, its history, geography, and personalities, from those stamps. I also discovered a tremendous amount about foreign countries.

Bruce Elman in Edmonton

So, it is hard for me to believe it but apparently Canada Post has come up with the ultimate "me" generation development – vanity stamps. The stamp is actually a two part affair – one part is a 46 cent stamp with a picture frame on it. The other part is a sticker of whatever photo you have sent them. You peel off the vanity portion and affix it to the frame and voila – you have your likeness on a stamp.

According to the representative of Canada Post, "It's a stamp you can use for any occasion – a wedding, a new baby, a school graduation." It is a very cute idea until you give it some thought. Then, it turns out to be incredibly stupid!

Now what will they permit on these vanity stamps? According to the spokesperson, "Nude or obscene or racially motivated content…would not get on the stamp." Leaving aside the question of who is going to decide on what constitutes nudity or what's obscene or racially motivated, everything else seems to be fair game.

Think about the possible uses you can make of this stamp. The most obvious is the commercial use: Maybe Toyota would like to put a picture of its new Echo on a stamp or perhaps lawyers will send out all their mail with their pictures on various stamps.

You could collect all the partners in one firm and have a complete set. I can see it now – the Witten series or the Fraser Milner series. The firms could even issue their own books for collecting these stamps, complete with pictures, bios, and a list of their most prestigious clients. I can see the avid philatelist in Sri Lanka just waiting to get his next letter from Canada, hoping it has a stamp of that one partner he or she is missing from the set.

Or it could have a religious application. How about a series of stamps with brachot on them or there could be the "We Want Mashiach – Now!" stamp. We could even put our religious leaders on stamps. The most obvious application is political, of course. Stockwell Day could have his karate picture printed on a bunch of these stamps. Then, everyone who gets a letter from him will be able to distinguish him – at least physically – from Tom Long.

Of course, presumably it does not even have to be a real photo or a photo of an actual event. Given the possibilities of computer generated images, a more malevolent soul could have Stockwell and Tom locked in a passionate embrace with Preston looking on either jealously or disapprovingly. This would probably upset either the pro-Gay rights lobby or the anti-Gay lobby or both.

Political ideas abound. The Liberal party could put Chrétien on the stamp. Opposition parties could use the same photo of the prime minister but place a diagonal line over his image or write NOT across the photo. Of course, we do not know if Canada Post would allow a stamp that denigrates our prime minister. How about a burning Canadian flag? No, you say? If there is no law against burning the flag, why can you not have a picture of a burning flag? Perhaps you can have a picture of someone else's flag burning.

I guess I shouldn't be so negative about this idea. It will create a lot of business for rights lawyers. Before you know it, my freedom of expression class will be oversubscribed. Perhaps I should ask the dean if I can be paid by the student and maybe I can get a kickback on every case brought in relation to the new stamps. After all, why should Canada Post make all the money?

When we were in Israel on sabbatical, our children were absolutely fascinated by Israeli stamps. Israeli stamps are some of the most beautiful, creative, and memorable stamps in the world. My family could hardly wait until the next series of stamps or the next special issue stamp was released. All over the world, there are scores of philatelists who collect these magnificent stamps. They are works of art and yet they are extremely educational. Each time on our return to Canada, I have tried to interest my children in Canadian stamps. I was never able to do so. Why? Because Canadian stamps are boring! boring! boring!

Instead of coming up with idiotic schemes such as the vanity stamp, which will only serve to make us the laughing stock of the stamp world, they ought to invest their time and energy in creating beautiful and educational stamps that the whole world will want to buy. Canada would do well to learn from the Israelis on this point.

The Kirshner File

Resurrection of Jewish life in Germany

In 1948, at its first postwar assembly, the World Jewish Congress warned Jews never again to settle on "blood-soaked German soil."

But at that precise moment, when swelling anti-German sentiment was probably at its peak, there was a remarkable efflorescence of Jewish life in the country Joseph Goebbels, the Nazi propaganda minister, had smugly declared "Judenrein" (free of Jews) back in 1943.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

When the World Jewish Congress issued its dire warning, there were already more than 100 Jewish communities in Germany, most of them with fewer than 50 members.

One must wonder why Jews, demonized and murdered under the imprimatur of a Nazi government, would have been drawn to Germany yet again.

Michael Brenner, a professor of Jewish history and culture at the University of Munich, is intrigued by that question. In After the Holocaust: Rebuilding Jewish Lives in Postwar Germany (Princeton University Press), he examines this phenomenon. His book is described as the first comprehensive account of the lives of Jews who remained in Germany immediately after World War II.

Who were these Jews who bucked convention and chose to establish themselves in Germany? They basically fall into three categories.

In the first category were several thousand Jews, born and bred in Germany, who had been hidden by spouses or friends during the war. They were highly assimilated and usually had no contact with the organized Jewish community.

Then there were the so-called returnees – German Jews who had been hounded out of Germany after Hitler's accession to power in 1933. They constituted a minuscule proportion of the total Jewish population after 1945.

Usually scholars, actors or journalists, they were tied to Germany culturally, linguistically and professionally.

Among them were Herbert Weichmann, a future mayor of Hamburg and minister of justice of North Rhine-Westphalia; Josef Neuberger, the future chairman of the Association of German Labour Unions; renowned sociologists Max Horkheimer and Theodor Adorno; actors such as Fritz Kortner and Ida Ehre; and writers of the calibre of Arnold Zweig and Stefan Heym.

The vast majority of the returnees, writes Brenner, hardly had any interest in the restoration of Jewish life, and took little or no part in the reconstruction of the Jewish communities.

The third and perhaps most important segment consisted of displaced persons from eastern Europe. From a demographic point of view, they eventually dominated Germany's resurrected Jewish community. For that reason, the thrust of After the Holocaust is on displaced persons (known as DPs).

In the first two postwar years, Germany was home to approximately 250,000 Jews, most of them DPs from countries such as Poland and Hungary. Emigration whittled down that number to 182,000 by 1947.

Seventy five percent of the DPs lived in temporary camps: Feldafing, Bad Reichenhall, Fohrenwald, Landsberg and the like. The rest could be found in German cities, particularly Munich, the centre of Jewish life in those uncertain years.

Most DPs were scattered throughout the American occupation zone, with the balance in the British and French enclaves.

Strangely enough, at least at the outset, the occupying powers thought nothing of placing Jewish refugees with Nazi collaborators from the Baltic states, Hungary and the Ukraine. This led to violent protests from Jewish survivors, and a decision to establish purely Jewish camps.

The camps, their ethnic composition notwithstanding, were in poor sanitary condition. President Harry Truman, in 1945, assigned Earl Harrison to examine the situation of Jewish DPs. Harrison issued a scathing report, and the problems were promptly resolved.

In these camps, Brenner notes, an autonomous Jewish culture evolved. "By constructing a Jewish society clearly distinguished from the German environment, the Jewish DPs lightened the psychological burden of being held in Germany after the liberation," he observes. "Jewish schools, theatre groups, newspapers and magazines (and) libraries...allowed many Jewish DPs to forget, at least for a while, that they were living in Germany."

There was a significant Jewish press during that period. From 1945 to 1951, more than 100 newspapers and magazines, often short-lived, were published, not only in Yiddish, but in Polish, Hungarian, Hebrew and Romanian.

Brenner points out that the first Yiddish newspapers were printed on the commandeered presses of Julius Streicher's hatesheet, Der Volkische Beobachter. How ironic.

Being concerned with their children's education, the survivors opened the first elementary Jewish school in Bergen-Belsen on July 1, 1945. By September, a Jewish high school with 60 students was in operation. Even yeshivot were established.

Bad Reichenhall, Germany [Sheldon Kirshner photo]

Given the undisputable fact that almost all the DPs wished to leave Germany, these institutions appeared and quickly faded. By 1952, some 12,000 Jewish DPs were still in Germany. Fohrenwald, the last Jewish DP camp on German soil, was closed on Feb. 28, 1957.

The Jewish refugees who stayed behind in Germany, permanently sitting on their suitcases, as the phrase went, did so for various reasons. They were sick and weak; they had to care for ailing relatives; they had built thriving businesses; they had married Germans.

Since many of the camps had been in southern Germany, the DPs gravitated to cities in Bavaria. There, for example, east European Jews made up 93 percent of the Jewish population. In northern Germany, however, they were in a distinct minority, being greatly outnumbered by Jews of German origin.

For all the common suffering they had endured at the hands of the Nazis, the traditional differences between German and eastern European Jews could not be erased. Many German Jews, for instance, could not identify with Yiddish, the lingua franca of the reestablished Jewish communities.

As Jews regained a foothold in Germany, which had a Jewish population of about 600,000 before Hitler's accession to power in 1933, they discovered that they could not find, much less keep, rabbis. Not until the early 1950s did Jewish communities once again enjoy systematic religious guidance. Even so, only seven full-fledged rabbis were serving congregations by 1960. Clearly, rabbis were reluctant to go to Germany

Be that as it may, the renewed Jewish presence in Germany was by then an irrevocable fact. Goebbels must have been spinning in his grave.

Ted Turner honoured by Haifa U Friends

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It was supposed to be Ted Turner's big night but his buddy James Carville almost stole the show with a stand up comedy routine that included an unexpected dose of self-deprecating humour.

Carville, introduced as "Clinton's spin doctor" and as "Machiavelli reincarnated," put politics aside to regale the audience with stories of his misadventures with his wife, Republican Mary Matalin, in which his Democratic politics lands him in hot water. Carville was speaking at Profiles in Peace II, a $250-a-plate fund-raising dinner sponsored by the Canadian Friends of Haifa University. During the course of the evening, the university honoured Turner with a Doctor of Philosophy, Honoris Causa.

The degree was "in recognition of Turner's revolutionary contribution to international communications, in token of his aid in advancing sports, in acknowledgement of his commitment on behalf of human welfare and the environment and for his friendship toward the University of Haifa."

Turner, 62, is best known as founder of CNN, the Atlanta-based 24-hour news network and as vice-chair of Time Warner Inc. In accepting his degree, Turner urged Israelis not to give up hope for a peaceful future. Peace would be "a great lift for the human spirit, a tremendous achievement…If we can have peace in the Middle East, we can have peace anywhere," he said.

Carville echoed Turner in urging Israelis not to give up hope for a better future. Carville, a political consultant who worked on Bill Clinton's 1992 presidential campaign as well as Ehud Barak's campaign for prime minister, urged the audience to "light a candle rather than curse the dark."

A gift from Canadian entrepreneur Frank Stronach helped establish a centre for peace studies recently and in another high profile project, IBM began construction of a 120,000 square-foot high-tech research centre last year .

איצט איז ירושלים ווידער די הויפטשטאָט פון א פריי ייִדישער מדינה. אין 1967 איז ירושלים ווידער געוואָרן א פאַראייניקטע שטאָט. 19 יאָר פון אַן אומנאַרמאַלער צעטיילונג, פון שטעכיקע דראָטן און שטיינערנע באריקאַדן האָבן זיך געעדיקט.

Society sets impossible standards for moms: author

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Many comedians have based their routines on the stereotype of the guilt-ridden Jewish mother. On behalf of all such Jewish mothers, vindication has come and its name is Dr. Harriet Lerner.

"Guilt is not all bad," says Lerner. "Guilt is an essential human emotion. It can inspire us to clarify our core values and is linked to our capacity to apologize to a child."

Lerner shared her own experiences with a large, attentive audience when she spoke recently at a fund-raising event sponsored by The Canadian Friends of The Hebrew University of Jerusalem in aid of The Lafer Centre for Women's Studies.

Lerner, an internationally renowned expert on the psychology of women and family relationships, is a senior staff psychologist at the Menninger Clinic in Topeka, Kansas and the author of eight books, including the best-selling trilogy The Dance of Anger, The Dance of Intimacy and The Dance of Deception.

Millions of copies of her books, translated into as many as 30 languages, have sold around the world.

Lerner's latest book, The Mother Dance: How Children Change Your Life, explores the adventure of motherhood from a personal point of view. In it, the author shares her own experiences, both positive and negative.

She readily admits to having had "bad mother days," claiming that "society sets impossible standards for mothers and then divides them into categories of good mother and bad mother."

Isolation preys on many mothers' emotions and feelings of inadequacy, Lerner said. "We need to hear the voices of other women telling us the truth about their limitations."

Lerner claims not to have had any desire for children up until the moment she became a mother. She readily admits to being a totally absorbed, loving and worrying parent from that moment forward.

"Kids are the best teachers of life's most profound spiritual lessons," she said. "Children are great teachers, and one of the things they will teach you is how to worry."

Lerner's lecture, held at Congregation Machzikei Hadas on May 15, followed a dinner for patrons of the event co-chaired by Marcia Cantor, president of the Ottawa chapter of CFHU and Ellen Fathi.

CAN WE TALK? Comedian Joan Rivers headlined last week's annual fund raising gala of the Baycrest Centre Women's Auxiliary. Rivers quipped that the only good thing about aging is "that you lose your memory and forget how lousy everything is." [Ron Csillag photo]

War criminals in Canada

Unauthorized Entry, The Truth About Nazi War Criminals in Canada, 1946-1956*, by Howard Margolian (University of Toronto Press).

Books
Bernard Baskin

The author of this diligently researched study (there are over 100 pages of notes) admits that about 2,000 war criminals, immigrants with strong Nazi affiliations, entered Canada during the years 1946 to 1956.

Why 2,000? Margolian indicates that this is the generally accepted figure. Some experts on the subject, however, suggest that the figure could be twice as high. In any case, the author, a consultant to Canada's war crimes prosecution unit and a historian who specializes in Nazi-occupied Eastern Europe, contends that Canada's record at screening immigrants for war criminals, while not unblemished, is still commendable and to be admired.

He points out that in the first decade after World War II, nearly 1.5 million persons emigrated to Canada. Almost two-thirds of them came from war-ravaged Europe. If we take the figure of 2,000 war criminals, then just over one-eighth of one percent of the total number of new Canadians are involved.

"Approximately three-quarters of these undesirables arrived here disguised as refugees. Yet the ratio of war criminals to refugees is almost as insignificant. Of the more than 150,000 European refugees who were admitted to Canada between 1946 and 1951, only one percent were suspected Nazi war criminals."

How did war criminals escape detection? The major reason, explains the author, is that proof of their crimes lay buried in records that were rendered inaccessible by the Soviet takeover in eastern Europe. Moreover, "inadequate anti-subversion training and a chronic shortage of sources led inevitably to mistakes and oversights."

In a chapter titled Exceptions that Prove the Rule, Margolian examines what he considers to be three special cases: the admission of scientists and technicians from Germany, Estonian "boat people" from Sweden, and former members of a Ukrainian SS division. In each case he endeavours to show that there was no abandonment of immigration criteria in the eventual decisions to admit members of formerly prohibited classes of prospective immigrants.

The government's decision about the SS caused widespread dismay and controversy. It provoked a firestorm of protest from the Canadian Jewish Congress and other sources. Margolian writes that these concerns were not without justification. Yet "nothing in Ottawa's handling of the matter suggested that the 14th SS was to be admitted en masse, or that individual members of the division who failed to meet the immigration criteria would nonetheless be granted visas. All that had changed was that membership in the division would no longer be grounds for automatic rejection."

In 1986, the Royal Commission of Inquiry on War Criminals concluded that undesirable immigrants were able to enter Canada with relative ease. Oral testimony before the commission by immigration and security officials indicated that there was insufficient training and limited resources for doing an effective job of screening Nazis and others.

The author rejects this other side of the picture as flawed, inconclusive and biased. It is likely that a half-century after the fact, most Canadians will find the entire matter remote and no longer relevant.

Irving Abella, president of the Canadian Historical Association and past president of the Canadian Jewish Congress, believes that the real scandal of the entire issue is not so much that criminals were allowed into the country, but "that for 50 years we refused to get them out. Of the thousands of Nazis who came to Canada since 1945, Canadian governments have extradited one and deported two."

For him, and for many others, that is the unhappy truth about war criminals in our country.

Shavuot – A dairy delight

The Canadian Jewish News cooks are always happy to share their tried and true recipes. The following will certainly add some tasty alternatives to your Shavuot meals.

BEET SALAD
(Frances Kraft)

4-5 whole beets, scrubbed
2 apples, peeled and cubed
Handful of chopped nuts
2 tsp. lemon juice
¼ cup mayonnaise

Cut off tops of beets leaving a little bit of stems. Boil. Rub off skins under cold running water. Refrigerate, cube, add remaining ingredients and combine.

NOODLE KUGEL
(Leila Speisman)

1 pkg. medium noodles
2 cups cottage cheese
½ cup sugar or sweetener (or to taste)
1 tsp. salt
Dash pepper
1 cup crushed corn flake crumbs
½ cup margarine, melted

Cook noodles until al dente (about 7 minutes). Combine cheese, sour cream, sugar, salt and pepper and mix well. Add cooked noodles. Spray 9 x 13 pan with cooking spray (unflavoured). Pour mixture into pan and smooth the top.

Melt margarine in small saucepan. Add corn flake crumbs, and stir mixture until crumbs are brown. Be careful not to let them burn.

Sprinkle crumb mixture over kugel. Bake at 350 for about 45 minutes.

EGGPLANT FETTUCCINE
(Gloria Clamen)

4 large eggplants peeled and cut into ¼-inch slices lengthwise
1 lb. fettuccine noodles, cooked
1 lb. ricotta cheese
Salt, pepper, nutmeg, oregano, garlic powder
Grated parmesan cheese
2 medium cans tomato sauce

Preheat oven to 350. Coat a 9 x 13 casserole with cooking spray. Brush eggplant slices with oil and broil 5 minutes on each side until lightly browned. Cool.

Mix ricotta cheese with cooked noodles, salt, pepper, garlic powder, a very generous sprinkling of parmesan cheese and a couple dashes of nutmeg.

Place a tablespoon of cheese-noodle mixture at one end of eggplant slice and roll up. Repeat until all eggplant slices have been rolled. Set aside.

Mix tomato sauce with seasonings to taste. Pour half on bottom of casserole. Place rolled eggplant slices on top of tomato sauce in casserole, and top with remaining sauce. Sprinkle with parmesan cheese. Bake at 350 for 30 minutes.

LUXURIANT CHOCOLATE CHEESE CAKE
(Bev Bergman)

Crust
8½-oz. package graham wafer crumbs (or chocolate graham wafer crumbs if you're a true chocoholic)
¼ cup melted butter
2 tsp. sugar
¼ tsp. cinnamon

Filling
3 eggs
1 cup sugar
24 oz. softened cream cheese (3 large pkgs.)
12 oz. package semi-sweet chocolate bits, melted
1 tsp. vanilla
1 cup sour cream
⅛ tsp. salt

Blend crust ingredients and spread over bottom of spring form pan as high on the sides as possible.

In a large bowl at high speed, mix eggs and sugar until light. Beat in softened cream cheese until smooth. Add cooled, melted chocolate, vanilla, salt and sour cream. Beat until smooth. Pour into crust. Bake 1 hour at 350 (or until small cracks appear on top), let cool and refrigerate as long as possible (preferably overnight).

Remove from spring form pan and place on a plate with halved strawberries all around.

Jewish Life

Shavuot sites on the Web

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Shavuot is certainly one of the most important holidays in the Jewish calendar. But the springtime festival which celebrates the giving of the Torah and the harvesting of the first fruits clearly doesn't receive the attention bestowed on Passover or even Chanukah. However, the holiday does get the attention it justly deserves – on the Internet.

On the first morning of the holiday, the Ten Commandments are read from the Torah. According to Virtual Jerusalem, "When the Ten Commandments were given at Mount Sinai, the course of human history was changed forever. No document has influenced the course of civilization like the Bible, and it can be argued that of all the contents in the Bible, these ten laws have been the single most influential section." [http://www.vjholidays.com/shavuot/ten.htm]. You can take a listen to a preview of them at Navigating the Bible [http://bible.ort.org/bible/htm/exodus/torah/19252001.htm].

Some people can be forgiven for being a bit groggy while listening to the Commandments. That's because they have just stayed awake the entire night for Tikkun Leil Shavuot. According to the Ohr Somayach All-Nighter page, one of the reasons we stay up all night is to commemorate a mistake committed centuries ago [http://www. virtual.co.il/education/education/ohr/special/shavuos/index.htm].

"On that first Shavuot morning, there were some who overslept and had to be awakened to receive the Torah. In order to rectify this, we stay up."

Shavuot is also known as the Festival of the First Fruits. While the land of Israel is blessed with many fruits, seven had special status as seen in the Seven Species Gallery [http://www.vjholidays. com/shavuot/fruit.htm]. These were the first fruits brought to the Temple once a year at Shavuot, and offered to God.

As such, they both symbolize the land of Israel and the close links of the Jewish people with that land. "God your Lord is bringing you to a good land...of wheat, barley, grapes, figs and pomegranates, a land of oil – olives and honey." (Deut 8:8-9) [http://bible.ort.org/bible/htm/deuteron/torah/08060807.htm].

The site set up by Beth El Temple Center of Belmont, Mass. suggests that since the holiday has lost its agricultural significance nowadays, Shavuot has been reinvested with new symbols [http://www.shamash.org/reform/uahc/congs/ma/ma002/shavuot.html]. In the mid-19th century, "the Reform movement added its own enhancement to Shavuot, the confirmation ceremony." This ceremony is meant to parallel the acceptance of the Torah at Mount Sinai with the confirmation that these young Jews are taking the Torah to their hearts.

Everyone is in agreement that the festival is unique because of the tradition of eating dairy products... and that usually means blintzes and cheesecake. You can find over 100 variations at the Jewish-Food Cheesecake Archives with everything from mocha to Miracle to Margarita [http://www.jewish-food.org/recipes/cheindex.htm].

Or if you want to celebrate the holiday while watching your waistline, you can send a virtual cheesecake through the e-mail [http:// www.vjholidays.com/shavuot/cheescake.htm]. Anyone you like will receive a photo of a lovely cake accompanied by your Shavuot greeting. No calories – good wishes only!

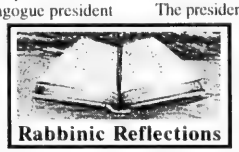
Judaism a package deal

By RABBI AVRAHAM PLOTKIN

With Shavuot approaching, I am reminded of the story of the new rabbi who was preparing his first sermon. Being young and inexperienced, he was asked by his synagogue president for a sneak preview. The rabbi explained to his president that the theme of his speech would be Jewish education and that he would discuss the importance of sending children to Jewish day schools.



"Sorry," said the president, "you can't talk about that or you will offend our members who send their children to public schools."

"Well," said the surprised rabbi, "then I guess I will talk about the importance of eating kosher food."

"Stop right there," interrupted the president. "The treasurer of our shul owns a non-kosher food franchise and there's no way you'll avoid hurting his feelings when you talk about kashrut."

"OK," said the rabbi. "If that's the case, I will talk about the significance of Shabbat and festivals."

"Sorry again," said the president.

"If you talk about Shabbat, you will alienate the bulk of our membership. It's too sensitive."

The rabbi, who at this point was confused and losing his patience, turned to the president and asked, "If I can't talk about Jewish education, kashrut or Shabbat, what do you expect me to talk about?"

The president calmly replied, "Easy, all you have to do is talk about some good old Judaism. That should do the trick."

Indeed, it is very easy to fall into the president's trap. We all enjoy a heavy dose of shmaltzy "Judaism," but alas, without the responsibilities and actual mitzvot that comprise Judaism. We love the philosophy, food and culture but not the commitment. We forget that Judaism is an action-oriented religion. It's a package deal. Judaism without Shabbat, kashrut or Jewish education is an oxymoron, an empty shell.

On Shavuot, we commemorate the receiving of the Torah. The midrash relates that the Torah was offered to all the nations of the world and was rejected by each of them for different reasons.

When it was offered to the Jewish people, however, they responded "We will do and [then] we will understand." This response not only showed their absolute dedication to the Torah but also reflected the spirit in which the Torah was given. The Torah was to be first and foremost, a book of action and then a book of ideas. The Torah was not intended to be a book used exclusively for mental gymnastics and scholarship. It was meant to motivate us to action and good deeds.

"Deed before creed" is said to be the motto of Judaism. The Talmud tells us that "action is of the essence" and in the tractate of ketubot it asks: "What is greater, study [of Torah] or action?" and it resolves: "Study is greater because it leads one to action." Contrary to the simple meaning, the Lubavitcher Rebbe of saintly memory explains that what the Talmud is really telling us is that the greatness of study lies in that it ultimately leads to action, with action being the ultimate achievement.

As Jews, we must realize that the only way to fulfil our role and achieve happiness is to observe the actual commandments of the Torah. Watered down "philosophical" or "cultural" Judaism is no substitute for the actual performance of the mitzvot of HaShem. Only through the observance of the mitzvot will we change this world into a better place and merit the coming of Mashiach speedily in our days.

Insured Annuities - Lifetime Guarantees of 10% Plus

In today's environment of low interest rates and volatile stock markets, many investors seek more attractive and less stressful investments.

If you are at retirement age and trying to maximize spendable income from non-RRSP savings, insured annuities provide the best of both worlds - significantly higher after-tax income for life and the capital guaranteed tax-free to your estate. The older you are, the higher the yield on your investment.

Consider the following example, which compares the investment of $200,000 in a GIC at 6% with an insured annuity, for a man aged 75.

GIC versus Insured Annuity

	GIC	Insured Annuity
Capital	200,000	200,000
Annual Income	12,000	26,300
Taxable Income	12,000	6,600
Tax (50%)	6,000	3,300
After Tax Income	6,000	23,000
Insurance Cost	NIL	11,000
Spendable Income	6,000	12,000
Gross Equivalent Yield	6%	12%
Estate Value	200,000	200,000
Subject to Probate	YES	NO
Guaranteed Period	5 YEARS	LIFE

Effective improved yield on investment = 100%

(This is an illustration only; rates will vary)

Coast to Coast

Even in recess, politics not dormant

Scene in Ottawa

By G.K. SIMCOE

Parliamentarians returned to their constituencies across the country, ostensibly to celebrate Victoria Day, but really to plant their gardens like the rest of us. This might suggest that all is relatively quiet on the political front…not! There were more defections for Joe Clark, as the chairman of his Newfoundland election campaign, Leo Power, joined former Ontario premier Frank Miller and former federal heavyweight, Doug Lewis, as the newest members of the Canadian Alliance.

For his part, Preston Manning is also worried. Perception being more important than reality in politics, Manning appears now to have been overshadowed in the CA leadership race by Tom Long and Stockwell Day. By all counts, Manning is in for a real fight.

The problem is, if he does win the race, and all the newly acquired Tories-cum-CA members signed up by Tom Long abandon this bold adventure, Joe Clark may yet be vindicated. After all, Clark has based his entire strategy on the assumption that when Tom Long goes down in defeat, all the dyed-in-the-wool Tories who supported Long will come back to the fold.

On the government side, rumours have been reported about a PMO attempt to woo former New Brunswick premier Frank McKenna to federal politics as an alternative to Paul Martin as the next Liberal leader.

This news has resurrected debate about when the prime minister will call the next election. Many Ottawa insiders are leaning to a fall vote so the Liberals can capitalize on a Canadian Alliance weary from their leadership race. More importantly, the government may want to go to the polls before any economic downturn sours voters on the Liberals. With increasing retail prices, the low dollar and interest rates rising every two weeks, it will not take much for the 50-percent-plus popular vote lead of the Liberals to disappear.

One possible hint Jean Chrétien will go to the voters early may be inferred from a story that didn't receive as much attention as might have been expected. It seems the government would like to quietly sneak some legislation through the House before MPs break for the summer. The legislation would ensure "adequate" severance packages for MPs and ministers who don't stand for re-election or lose in the next election. People are wondering why the government would be in a rush to pass the severance bill unless an election was imminent. And you thought politics is dormant when the House is in recess!

A fun venue helps to make a party fun

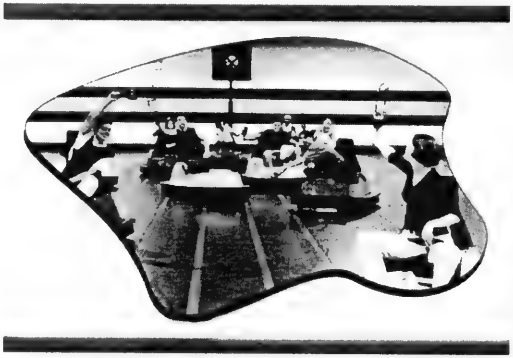
By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

Looking for a place to party? Shelley Meretsky of Personally Yours (905-882-7531) hosts kids' parties, and Lorrie Chih of Rinx (416-410-7469, ext. 22) hosts everything from babies' birthdays to corporate team building. But they both agree that the right venue can help make your event a success.

If Meretsky were advising you, she'd begin by asking: What kind of party? There's an immense difference between a bar mitzvah and an 80th birthday. Think about the time of day and the date: the busier the season, the farther ahead you should book, she says.

A kids' party poses the special challenge of harmonizing what you want and what your child wants, she says. One major question is how many kids to invite. Too few may make it hard to get the party off to a start; too many may engender chaos. Personality plays a role, too. An introverted child may feel most comfortable with close friends; aspiring party animals may want to invite everyone they say "Hi" to.

Rinx is a well-known attraction on Orfus Rd.



The more guests, the harder it is to keep a lid on high jinks, without playing drill sergeant. What should be planned, what spontaneous? How old are your guests? Natural exuberance fuelled by party foods may make teenagers or pre-teens unruly without their even trying.

On the other hand, with little kids, especially in wet or cold weather, how many are you willing to help with boots and outerwear? And how about getting them to the party, then home afterward?

Only after you answer all these questions, Meretsky emphasizes, should you start hunting for a locale. List every possible place. Then call the venues one by one, and ask another set of questions: Where is the venue? When does it operate? What numbers can it accommodate? What kind of staff does it have? How many? Can they handle disabilities and allergies? Do they provide food? Snacks or a meal? Can you bring your own? Do they offer extras you might want, such as birthday cakes?

If they don't, will they recommend and work with someone who does? What about crafts and activities? Do they match your kid's and his friends' age group? And what about boy-girl differences? Politically correct or not, they do matter.

There are plenty of unusual locales. Rinx, besides sports you'd expect like in-line skating, offers Lazer Tag (a maze survival sport), and Whirly Ball (a blend of basketball and lacrosse, played in bumper cars). These activities are fun for kids, but also for corporate types looking for interesting ways to build team spirit.

Chih has noticed that if a venue is exciting enough, easy access to highways or transit is not essential. Guests will make their own arrangements; so look over the entire city and its environs.

You don't have to be a member. You do have to enjoy the best of everything.

Funny; we thought everybody knew. If you haven't heard, we're pleased to inform you that you do not have to be a member of Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue to enjoy Sam Firestone's wonderful catered events on the premises. A facility this beautiful should be accessible to everyone, and it is.

You do have to satisfy a number of other requirements:

1. You must enjoy being fussed over (by Les Firestone and his staff);
2. You must have an appreciation for exquisite regional cuisine;
3. You must love the idea of combining, under one roof, the dignity of a traditional synagogue ceremony with the refinement of a Firestone catered event.

The beautifully renovated facilities at Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue offer a sumptuous setting for your simcha

Freedom of Sound: Years ahead of its time

By Oded Friedman

In 1996, Freedom of Sound emerged into the entertainment industry, taking it by storm. The company's philosophy since its conception has always been to focus on providing an incredible array of interactive disc jockey services. In fact, this is the highlight of the fun-filled, high-energy affairs in which it specializes – being "interactive", meaning catering to the needs of it's clients by relying on everyone's participation every step of the way.

In the present day, it seems that the changing needs of the clientele have not been adequately recognized by the entertainment industry. It is here, however, that Freedom of Sound stands tall, by shedding new light on the concept of innovation and throwing convention out the window.

In exemplary fashion, then, Freedom of Sound introduced its user-friendly party planner catalogue which enables readers to tailor a party in ten easy steps. These steps allow one to choose from over a thousand possibilities, ranging from various entertainment crews, sound systems, intelligent lighting and laser systems, prizes, special effects, video screen packages, live performers, inflatable and carnival games, video arcades, casino, and fun foods. The convenience to the potential client practically jumps out of the catalogue.

In addition, Freedom of Sound is continually updating its party options by searching throughout the entertainment industry for any newly released products or services so that it always remains one step ahead of the game. As well, Freedom of Sound can now be found on the web making event bookings that much easier to the client. In fact, once an internet user enters www.freedomofsound.com they will find a cyber-catalogue, a virtual version of the user-friendly party planner catalogue paper version, which again emphasizes Freedom of Sound's notion that ease can go hand in hand with excellence. Rather than being bombarded with unnecessary information, the cyber-catalogue offers a means of selection making and event booking that is as simple as the click of a mouse button.

On this note, the launching of a new entertainment division, the CRAZY BAR, recently got under way. CRAZY BAR is a unique concept that only Freedom of Sound offers – a portable interactive bar catering service. These lightweight, easy to transport, trendy portable bars are indispensable, serving as focal points in receptions and cocktail parties. This concept again defines the interactive side of Freedom of Sound. Instead of only sending out a bar and bartenders to serve at parties, the company supplies dancers dressed in beautiful costumes that perform a choreographed dance matched to a selected theme song, and then give out drinks on the dance floor.

For example, upon hearing the Aqua song, "Dr. Jones", several dancers dressed as nurses and doctors rush onto the dance floor with syringes in their hands filled with Fun drink to dispense among the crowd. The company's personal favorite theme is one which accompanies the Tequila Man who enters the dance floor, dressed in the appropriate Mexican attire, to the song "Tequila" and hands everybody the flavorful specialty shots. Throughout the night, CRAZY BAR continues serving drinks in between performances, acting as a specialized Martini Bar, Tropical Bar, Frozen Fruit Cocktail Bar, or Mocktail (nonalcoholic beverages) Bar for children. The portable services cater bar/bat mitzvahs, weddings, carnivals, corporate functions, fund raising events, private parties and more.

With ingenuity running deep into the company's soil, there's no wonder the fruits the company bears are staggering to say the least. Freedom of Sound breathes life into each party it throws with its wide array of growing selections – light and laser shows, dancers, interactive bar services, live performers and so much more – all packaged with one concept in mind: Being user-friendly. Past and present clients are unanimous in attesting to the company's unwavering dedication to excellence: Freedom of Sound is indeed in tune with the crowd's pulse!

Why stay at home when party places are so much fun?

Chih recommends getting everything under one roof: venue, decor, catering and activities. You'll have enough to do; best to accomplish in one meeting what would otherwise take several.

Spaciousness, good maintenance and cleanliness are musts. If you're doing your own decorating, go for neutral decor and accommodating staff.

Besides being honest, sensitive, organized, resourceful and creative, good staff need negotiating skills, Chih says. For instance, they may have to mediate between you ("I'm the parent, it's my dollar and I love pink") and your birthday boy ("It's my party, and my hockey pals think pink is sissy").

The little touches count too – things like having a staff member greet every guest at the door. Such details demonstrate thoroughness and consideration at the same time.

And organization is more than just scheduling. Some rigid types call themselves "organized." They're wrong. Good organization means having a schedule but adjusting for contingencies like over-long speeches. It means knowing what's essential and what can be abbreviated or dispensed with at need.

For Rinx, Chih advises booking two to three weeks ahead for events with under 50 guests, about five weeks for 50 to 350. The smaller the venue, the earlier you should book.

Add whatever lead time you can, if you want exclusive use of an area. It's often an advantage. You may want to hold a children's party without worrying about strangers being around, for example.

However much you plan (and some people actually enjoy planning), always keep your ultimate purpose in mind. Meretsky and Chih agree that at the end of the day, what counts is: Will the guests have fun? If the answer turns out to be Yes, then no matter what else happens, you can call your party a success.

When in doubt, think about jewelry

By ADAM SEGAL
CJN Intern

If you're banging your head on the wall over what party gift to buy, think about luxury, sentimentality and style, and your obvious choice will be jewelry, said Brian Saltzman of Karats Fine Jewellery (416-494-6655).

"When you give jewelry to a person, they will always remember that gift," said an employee at Mark Lash Designs Fine Jewelry (416-256-5229). "Jewelry is long lasting. It offers sentimental value."

Important to ask around

While the appeal of jewelry is widespread, tastes tend to be diverse. Saltzman urges prospective buyers to think carefully about the personality and age of the person for whom the gift is intended before making a purchase.

For instance, star and butterfly shaped pendants may be particularly appealing to teenaged girls, but not to older women. It may be wise to run a description of the person the jewelry is for to the salespeople, so they can find something appropriate.

Unlike typical wheeling and dealing, Saltzman says salespeople at his store make buyers feel comfortable. "We have a laid back atmosphere," he says. "We let the customer decide what they want to buy (without)... being pushy."

As with any precious metal, authenticity and high-quality craftsmanship is imperative. Check to see if the jewelry has a trademark and carat stamp and take note of polish and finishing. Some jewelry items should also come equipped with a safety clasp and if you do not see one, request it, advises the Lash employee.

Sometimes, old jewelry, especially if it is a family emblem, can be one of the most meaningful gifts a person receives, the Lash employee said. Reputable stores can remodel old items so they have a fresh look and fit the person comfortably.

Furthermore, jewelry stores tend to have a high number of return customers, so it is important to ask around to see which stores your friends or relatives are happy with.

Both jewellers said that styles have not gone through drastic changes, but there are certain new trends to consider. White gold is quite popular as is silver. Coloured stones and floral motifs are also fashionable. Eternity diamond bands as an anniversary gift continue to be popular.

Choose a hall that's one of a kind

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

If you count everything from rumpus rooms to halls and hotels, there's no dearth of party venues.

At the same time, many people are no longer satisfied with locales that offer neutral space, and there's growing demand for special, one-of-a-kind environments, according to representatives of three such locations – Philippa Kennedy of Stock Market Place at the Toronto Stock Exchange (416-947-4396); Douglas Markoff of the Civic Garden Centre at Edwards Gardens (416-397-1346); and Isla Adelson Chertkoff of the Ontario Science Centre (416-696-3150).

In venues such as these, Kennedy points out, you needn't worry much about decor: the ambience is already there. (The Civic Garden Centre does let you decorate if you wish, prohibiting only confetti and fireworks.)

All three locations have easy transit and highway access. With more choice of spaces, says Adelson Chertkoff, what sets one venue apart from another is service.

She advises consulting caterers on this point. It's something they have a good sense for, she says.

Stock Market Place, as you would expect, sees lots of corporate events for cocktail receptions (maximum number 300), sit-down dinners (maximum 100) and buffets; they also host university and high school groups. The glassed-in dinner room offers a fine view of the downtown lights. Though you can book on short notice, earlier is better.

Stock Market Place's interactive games are fun and challenging. Accumulator lets you pick 10 stocks, then grades you on their performance for 10 years. Capital Markets turns you into a CEO, matching wits with your counterparts in some of Canada's biggest companies.

The Global Media Wall exhibit brings you minute-by-minute information on world markets. Barter to Bytes covers economics from ancient times to the present; and there's a museum of old stock market artifacts like teletypes and ticker-tape machines. Retired floor traders lead tours and there are live interviews with top business people.

You can integrate stock market technology into your party with ticker-tape messages, for example, or hockey finals on screen. There's a stage for live events, and four caterers to choose from.

The Civic Garden Centre, set amid green parkland, is open every day but Christmas and Easter. Its two main rooms have landscaped garden patios. The building interiors are spacious and airy; the glassed-in main atrium offers you a solarium-like view of the gardens.

The biggest room, the Floral Hall, seats 350 in a theatre-type setting and 100 for dinner, and has a stage; the Garden Auditorium seats 120 as a theatre, 100 for dinner. These rooms have their own sound and lighting systems, and kitchens for heating food; you choose your own caterer.

There's nothing as romantic as a cruise

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Few things are as romantic as a honeymoon cruise, says Chris Chiang, director of cruises for Air Transat Holidays (905-405-8585).

"With all the on-board amenities, such as dancing under the stars, daily entertainment, intimate dinners, breakfast in bed, hot tub and sauna, and the exotic ports, the couple can't help but have a good time," she says.

Ruby Silvertown, president of Travel Network Corp. (789-3271) says cruises are a wonderful way to spend a honeymoon because the couple is "waited on hand and foot. Everything is taken care of from start to finish, and even though they travel to a number of different places, they never have to pack and unpack.

"As well, they don't lose a day every time they visit another city, and they do not have to change hotels. The boat travels while they sleep; so when they wake up they are at a new port. It's a stress-free vacation."

Cruises can be arranged on most travel budgets, she says. "A three-star destination cruise means that the ship visits a lot of ports and travellers spend less time on the ship. There is not as much on-board activity as on a higher end cruise; the ship is used as a means of getting from place to place."

Cruise destinations could be the southern Caribbean, which includes San Juan, Trinidad, Barbados, Antigua, Tortola and St. Thomas, or South America and the Amazon which includes Buenos Aires, Montevideo, Rio de Janeiro and Recife.

If the couple is flexible with their travelling schedule, she says, it is easier to find a less expensive cruise. "We can often arrange a four-star cruise for a three-star price, if they travel when the space is available. The further they book in advance, the better the chance of finding a good price."

If the fare goes down after you book a cruise, says Silvertown, you get the lower fare. "It's a win-win situation. You get a better choice of cabins if you book early, and you get a good price."

Chiang says most cruise lines have a number of packages available, depending on the couple's tastes and budget. "Depending on their destination, they can choose to have a half-day tour in Alaska, Europe, Hawaii and South America, a half-day tour or catamaran tour in Bermuda and the Caribbean, or snorkelling for two at Great Stirrup Cay or in Mexico.

"They can also choose such things as champagne, flowers and chocolates delivered to the stateroom, honeymooners' tables in the dining room or a honeymoon photograph," says Chiang.

"All in all, it is a sensuous experience," says Silvertown. "The water, clean air and all the amenities make for a romantic, memorable vacation."

A cruise makes a great honeymoon.

Entertainers bring any party to life

By ADAM SEGAL
CJN Intern

There is never a dull moment at a party if the entertainment involves the audience, say two local entertainers.

Marilyn Monroe impersonator Zahava Marks of Hollywood Heaven (416-876-8936) and Shane Farberman, the real face behind Doo Doo the Clown of Farco Entertainment (416-226-1108) view interaction between the entertainer and the guests as the key to livening up a party.

"The audience is never bored if you interact with them," says Marks, whose "Marilynesque" rendition of Happy Birthday Mr. President and comedy act has had audiences in stitches, she says.

Marks started meticulously studying the famed actress and model – from her movements to her facial expressions – a few years ago, and entertained audiences to make some extra cash. Now, the act is in high demand, she says.

During the summer, Marks juggles three or four acts a week, usually at corporate functions, but also does birthdays and singing telegrams. She recommends booking a week in advance.

Marks says her impersonation is a classy act and a great way to loosen up the corporate crowd. The performance "gets people away from their worries and lets them be with an icon," she says.

Much of Marks' clientele is Jewish; so she has moulded her act accordingly. "I can even do Marilyn in Hebrew," she says.

For younger crowds 10 and under, Farco Entertainment's Doo Doo the Clown puts on an elaborate hour-long show that includes juggling, fire-eating, arts and crafts and dancing.

"Our show is unbelievable and all of our T-shirts say that," says Farberman who has been clowning for 20 years.

Farco Entertainment has 32 employees and does more than clown acts. "We'll bring in bands or book out other characters for a party," says Farberman, who has travelled across North America and Europe as Doo Doo and did a clown spot in the film Billy Madison.

Farberman says really talented clowns are hard to come by. "There may be 20 clowns who want to work and only four are good," he says. "Customers will know if you just want the money. You have to love what you're doing."

Farco Entertainment has booked events six months in advance, but Farberman says two week's notice is sufficient. The company also entertains at corporate functions and bar and bat mitzvahs. The Web site is www.farcoenetainment.com.

Invitations also a souvenir of your party

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

When you're having a party, the invitations you send out are like the preview of a film, and it's often the preview that entices the guest to the theatre.

Gilda Lefton of Stationery Plus (905-881-5588) and Jodi Rodness of Papers 'N Prints (905-764-7455) have some insights into how to make your "preview" a drawing card. Both are knowledgeable invitation professionals who enjoy working with their clients.

Your invitation provider, Lefton says, must treat you as an individual, not just another lined-up customer. This means being organized, punctual and honest with scheduling: no double booking, no scheduling appointments so close together she has to rush. You deserve an open-ended meeting that gives you as much time as you need.

It also means being patient, Rodness says. Many clients are nervous when they first come in – the more important a celebration, the greater the pressure to do everything right, down to the finest detail. Part of any professional's job is to lighten this pressure and put the client at ease.

To this end, Rodness says, the place where you meet should be comfortable. She works out of her home and finds that many clients like this.

Lefton believes an experienced person is better able to advise you not only on visual design, but on wording. Rodness agrees, and also values what one can learn from related fields such as entertainment or visual arts.

Lefton does both catalogue invitations and custom design, and can show you many samples of her own work.

Everyone in the invitation field has the same catalogues, Rodness says. How they use the materials and designs to match your event and personal preferences is what counts.

Lefton says she shares the client's excitement when, together, they hit on the right design and wording. But though she values creativity, she does not put it first. Furthermore, she doesn't always feel she has to think that the client's choice is the best and says her job is not to push her ideas but to offer them. Then the client makes the final choice. Rodness, who abhors hard sells and high pressure, agrees.

Lefton says diplomatic skills are often called for. The people involved in planning a wedding, for instance, may disagree on paper stock, design and wording; and the task of reconciling such differences may fall to the invitation professional.

Make your invitations a drawing card

In this connection, the clients are well advised to bring with them to the invitation provider anyone who has a right to a voice in how the event is organized. This may seem to make things more difficult, but in the long run, it's better if you leave the meeting secure in the knowledge that every voice that should be heard has been listened to.

While family structures and social roles are changing, some traditions persist. Most of Rodness' clients are still women, though more men come now as well.

Tastes and preferences in invitation designs range from simple to complex. Picture above supplied by Stationery Plus.

Tastes and preferences range from starkly simple to complex and elaborate. For example, Lefton says, some people prefer to link the colour and design of their invitations to the decor; others do not. And while some people know exactly what they want, Rodness observes, many do not.

Lefton and Rodness both make a point of having a large inventory, not only of cards and stationery, but of accessories like kippot, party favours, place cards, thank you notes, imprinted mementoes, and bridal party gifts.

Materials and designs are constantly added to, trends change, and staying up to date is an ongoing study. Lefton mentions new paper stocks that can be printed on or used as backings, with or without bows or rhinestone ornaments. Rodness says some people are now using translucent paper for invitations.

On the other hand, Lefton also sets great store by some older technologies and materials. Fine and interesting as some computer work is, nothing surpasses quality printing for texture and appearance, she says.

Finally, look for someone who will work with any budget, lavish or modest, and always produce a thing of beauty. Besides being a preview of your celebration now, an invitation card will later be a souvenir; and as John Keats said, "A thing of beauty is a joy forever."

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

When everyone is up on the dance floor enjoying the music, it's a happening party, says Ed McMurtry, of Mister Disc Jockey/Edwin Allen Productions (905-473-3800).

"If the music isn't good, the food doesn't taste as good; the room doesn't look as good; the party doesn't sparkle," he says.

Interactive themes are a great way of drawing in the crowd. "Our earth, wind and fire theme includes a young dancer eating fire, and other dancers being blown by a wind machine," says McMurtry, who was recently nominated for having the most spectacular show and best entertainment by the International Special Events Society.

Mandell Entertainment (905-886-4000) recently launched its own venue at the Capitol Event Theatre on Yonge Street, says owner Corey Mandell. The refurbished vaudeville theatre with a full kosher kitchen, can hold events for up to 1,500 people.

A new dance studio has been added at his offices so that a girl or boy can come in and rehearse with a dance troupe and become part of the interactive team at their bar or bat mitzvah. "These dancers add so much to the party. They interact with the guests, teach them the dance trends, and perform routines.

"We've also taken sound and lighting to a new level. Our new CD players have 24 times more memory, which means the music will not skip," he says.

Phil and David Hart, of Hart Entertainment (416-769-5000) specialize in bringing "old-fashioned fun" to a party. "We rent out such things as inflatable beach volleyball equipment, an inflatable rock climbing wall or a 16-foot-long miniature golf course.

"Not everyone at a bar or bat mitzvah wants to dance, so we offer them something fun to do instead," Hart says.

Grant Cowan, owner of Universal Sound (905-619-4558), says he can make a party fun, regardless of whether his clients want four disc jockeys, full lighting and a dance troupe, or simply want great music. "It all depends on what they want. Each person is different, and each party is different," Cowan says.

A favourite at parties, he says, is his pyrotechnics display. "The crowd loves it when the guest of honour enters through a display of fireworks. It adds something special to the evening."

When choosing an entertainment company, Cowan suggests asking for trade references, such as hotels or banquet halls. "They've seen all the entertainers and they know who clients can depend on. Their recommendations carry weight."

Freedom of Sound's (905-760-0040) new portable Crazy Bar, has become a favourite at many parties, says owner Miki Klevan. "It is the next step in interactive entertainment services."

Crazy Bar is an interactive catering bar service which includes costumed dancers who perform dance routines to a selected theme song while they serve drinks on the dance floor. "The bar is lightweight, easy to transport and simple to set up," Klevan says.

Jared Florence, who owns Entertainment Xtreme (488-5789) with Bram Rubinoff, says the dance troupe, Let's Dance, featuring Lindsey Freedman and Jody Pettle, "add a lot to his parties.

"The fun is contagious. We have the adults dancing to kids' music, and kids dancing to adults' music. The dancers choreograph different moves and get the crowd going," Florence says.

"We take it a step further than performing. The DJs and the dancers are always out there with the crowd, making sure they have a good time. We also have a good time, and that shines through."

Times Square Entertainment (905-881-6400) can make a party great on almost any budget, says owner Rick Levine. "We offer sophisticated or simple lighting with two DJ's and a sound system, or if the clients want, we offer an elite party including several costumed dancers, computer controlled lighting and a nightclub sound system."

With a combination of the Rick Levine Band and Times Square Entertainment, adults and kids all have a great time. "It offers a lot of variety to the evening. Another alternative is to have a keyboard and saxophone during the cocktail hour, and a DJ at the party."

Be selective, set limits on desserts to avoid heaps of leftovers

By ADAM SEGAL
CJN Intern

We've all seen lavish sweet tables and dessert carts with enough food to feed guests for days, even weeks.

Beverley Golden of Metropolitan Ice Cream (905-731-0533), says toning down party dessert time can help avoid heaps of leftovers.

"There are so many people who are buying too much," she says. "Be realistic, set limits."

Golden advocates a simple yet tasty approach to desserts and says Metropolitan Ice Cream's strictly kosher (COR) array of ice-cream cakes, sorbets, yogurt, fresh fruit, ice cream, glacés and does just that. "Simple things can have a bigger impact."

On the other hand, fancier desserts that are especially pleasing to the eye continue to appeal to many people.

Leah Kalish, the pastry chef at kosher (COR) caterer GMB (416-789-7811), says people at parties want dessert to "look good, not skimpy. Plenty of people want showier desserts."

GMB's assortment of pastries ranges from chocolate-mousse cups and carmel pecan tartlets to berry crumble cakes.

Kalish says guests will be impressed if desserts come in numerous flavours and colours and offer several different fruits, nuts, chocolates and cookies.

As for those notoriously long lineups at sweet tables, both Kalish and Golden have figured out a way to avoid the problem.

Kalish suggests serving "homier" desserts – guests can sit at their seats and munch on a piece of cake or a series of smaller pastries that are served to the table.

Golden's secret lies in preparation. She fills special cups with ice cream and places them in a dessert cart ahead of time, so people can grab the cups at will and not have to wait to be served.

Remember to consult with the dessert caterer and guests about quantity, food allergies and an appropriate time to serve dessert. Kalish says she recently prepared desserts fit for 175 people at a party of 300, because the client knew certain guests were not dessert eaters and several people would be leaving early. At weddings and bnei/bnot mitzvah, Kalish says 10:30 p.m. is usually dessert time.

Party theme desserts

Chances are, there is a special dessert that is in line with the theme of your party. Dessert caterers are more than happy to prepare desserts that match the theme.

For Saturday night affairs, GMB and Metropolitan Ice Cream request that arrangements be made to have the dessert cart delivered no later than 3:00 p.m. Friday, since they do not work on Shabbat.

Dessert needs to be planned in the context of the entire meal. If there is meat, for instance, it is necessary to ask the caterer to serve pareve ice cream. In addition, the size of a meal will also impact on how heavy or light dessert should be.

The catering business generally runs on a referral basis, so it is important to speak with friends and relatives to find the right company.

Booking a few months in advance is recommended.

Style of party supplies follows fashion trends

By ADAM SEGAL
CJN Intern

Choosing from a seemingly endless number of party rental firms is a challenge. To make it easier, Mary Crothers of Chairman Mills (416-391-0400) suggests going with a firm that has a formidable reputation.

"There are plenty of reputable companies in the city," says Crothers, who notes her firm has had the same clients for over 50 years.

Crothers and another veteran in the field, John Higgins of Higgins Party Rentals (416-252-4050) point out the style of party rental equipment tends to follow current fashion trends. Silver is particularly hot right now, along with light pastel colours. The industry has also seen a shift towards rectangular shaped dishes and candleholders.

While style is important, Higgins and Crothers both say price and the comfort of guests is pivotal. For example, guests should normally have two feet of space between each other when sitting at a table.

For a wedding, it may be appropriate to pay a little extra for padded chairs, but for smaller occasions, like Passover seders, basic chairs which cost $1.25 each, are just fine.

To save money, without abandoning quality presentation, Crothers recommends putting together centrepieces on your own.

A simple and attractive example Crothers lauds is filling a rose bowl with water and food colouring and jazzing the bowl up with anything from floating candles and toy frogs, to flowers or sliced lemons. "It's lovely for summer and it doesn't cost a lot," she says.

If you're planning a large party, visiting the rental firm's showroom is a must. Crothers says most companies will set up a mock table, so the client can get a clear sense of what the final product will look like.

Something to watch out for is the size of the room the party is held in. Although party halls can be quite large, clients may not have access to the entire hall and rental firms need to know the size in order to calculate how many tables and chairs will fit.

There are smaller spaces as well.

For most dates, book a year ahead. You can't book earlier, because the Civic Garden Centre keeps space open for horticultural exhibits. Since these are infrequent during the winter, it's easier to reserve space then. The centre is disability friendly, and provides security. Party professionals have early access. Prices are competitive.

The Ontario Science Centre accommodates from 10 to 5,000 guests for anything from business meetings and educational tours to bar and bat mitzvahs. Kids love the place; and for adults who've forgotten their high-school science, the 800 permanent exhibits are a fun refresher. Many exhibits are interactive.

The settings are diverse, suitable for everything from cocktails to dancing, and include the ravines in the immediate vicinity. The "greenhouse style" Valley Market Place restaurant, for example, offers a panorama of the surrounding outdoors, and hosts dinner and dancing for up to 375.

You can choose from several caterers, including kosher ones. The earlier you book, the better – reservations are already booked into 2001.

The major current exhibit is Timescape, running until late in 2001, which explores the phenomenon of time from the Earth's beginnings into the next millennium. It includes the Earth Walk through the geological history of our planet, and the Morphing Demonstration, where the image of a face is scanned into a computer and aged decades into the future.

The Shoppers Drug Mart Omnimax Theatre has a wraparound sound system, and Ontario's only 24-metre domed screen. It's ideal for making the newest discoveries in fields like astronomy come alive

Whether your simchah is big or small, don't decide until you look at facilities such as these. They're just three of the many exciting environments you can check out.

Places like The Ontario Science Centre (pictured here), the Toronto Stock Exchange and Civic Garden Centre now provide party alternatives.

Tailored jackets that fall to the hips look elegant

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Colours run the gamut this season, from bright orange, sunlight yellow and fuchsia to a variety of pastels, says Priti Karunakaran, owner of Karisma Collections, a women's fashion boutique (416-663-1500, ext. 228).

The mixing and matching of colours depends largely on the nature of the party.

For proms, ankle-length, satin gowns topped with a layer of tulle is trendy. "The bodice, a tank top, is accented with beads, and the girls carry a beaded purse as an accessory. This is classic, formal attire," Karunakaran says.

An elegant, long, flowing, satin gown with spaghetti straps or halter neck, is popular for formal parties. "A black dress may be accented by a fuchsia shawl and purse, or a bright coloured dress might be matched up with a black shawl and purse. Colours are showing up in every outfit," Karunakaran says.

Tony Tiraborelli, president of Michi Petites (416-250-5359) says that two-piece dresses with long, taffeta skirts and bead-embellished corsets or halters are important this season, and for evening affairs, women are accessorizing with a pashmina wrap.

Tiraborelli says summer barbecues are the time to wear ankle-length pants with slits or denim capris with brocade trim, topped with a peasant top or a brightly coloured T-shirt,.

Women of all ages are wearing capris for casual evening parties, says Karunakaran. "For a slightly dressier look, a woman can wear capris detailed with beading or embroidery, topped with a tank top and sheer blouse. Printed Hawaiian shirts in bright colours have also become a big seller."

Gift-bags to welcome out-of towners

By ADAM SEGAL
CJN Intern

If out of town guests will be attending your simchah, treating them to a hospitality gift bag is a warm way to thank them for coming, says Freda Gottesman-Brender of the Golda Meir chapter of Jewish Woman International Canada (416-221-7442).

Gottesman-Brender suggests providing guests with a bag full of goodies, from bottled water and fresh fruit, to chocolates and candy for those with a sweet tooth.

"If you've come a long way and you're hungry, this gives you something to eat," she says. "It means the person who invited the guests appreciates the fact they came that distance."

The Golda Meir chapter members who prepare the bags, carefully package and wrap all of the food – purchased that day – and deliver it to the hotel. A card is inserted inside the bags informing the guests that proceeds are used to fund charitable projects, including a home for children with special needs in Israel.

"People feel [the party hosts] were thoughtful in giving money to tzedakah," she says.

The colour of the bag depends on what the client requests. "I ask [the client] what the theme of the party is and what their centrepieces look like and we try to co-ordinate [so] the bags match the theme," she says.

Gottesman-Brender recommends checking with guests to see if they keep kosher or have special health concerns, before putting the bags together.

She points out the bags, which start at $18, are a viable alternative to traditional gift baskets which, she says, tend to offer less food than the bags and are too large to be taken home by travelling guests.

The women at Jewish Women International put together the finishing touches on a hospitality gift bag.

Bright colours are in this season

Classic pant suits are still the rage for the party that falls somewhere between formal affair and casual patio party, she says. "Tailored jackets that fall to the hips look elegant with a pair of ankle-length, cuffed pants. Turquoise looks gorgeous for the summer, and when it is accented by a beaded purse, a woman can wear it almost anywhere."

Beaded accents are huge, says Karunakaran. "A beaded shawl in the same or contrasting colour to the outfit is stunning. You can match a brightly coloured suit with an off-white tank top and off-white shawl, or you can pair a turquoise outfit with baby pink. Alternatively, a white outfit looks great accented with bright colours."

Another fashionable style is the snakeskin look. "Polyester or rayon dresses are dressed up by using snakeskin, and small beads of crystal are attached to garments to give them a snakeskin look,"Karunakaran says.

Even shoes are brightly coloured this summer, says Tiraborelli. "They are pretty, sexy and strappy, and come in every imaginable colour."Classic pant suits are still the rage for the party that falls somewhere between formal affair and casual patio party, she says. Style of party supplies follows fashion trends

It may be wise to mention the theme of your party to rental firms. "If [the party] is super formal, we'll tie in the table (colour and style) with the decor," says Higgins.

Don't fret over whether you forgot something. Rental firms are usually stacked with a wide range of products, including dishes, tables, chairs, barbecues, linens, candleholders, carpet and even dance floors. Salespeople will make sure you're aware of everything and anything that will make the dining and reception area complete.

With warm summer days around the corner, people will be flocking to barbecue parties in large numbers. Higgins says the top-selling barbecue of late is a six footer, which should comfortably feed 200 people. For smaller affairs, three feet is perfect.

At peak times, like summer, it is important to book about two months in advance, or even longer depending on how formal the party is.

There's more to decor than meets the eye

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

If you're throwing a party, decor and accessories might not be a top priority. First impressions count, though, as Richard Winkler of Happy Days (416-789-4438) points out, and decor does a lot to create the mood. And the first thing your guests see is the hall.

Moods vary from party to party. Deciding that you want an atmosphere with both a formal element and a fun element, say, for a bar mitzvah, is an important first step, but it doesn't tell either you or your supplier what's going to make your event different from every other.

Before choosing a supplier, Winkler urges, give serious thought to what kind of first impression you want to make. Then, when you visit a showroom, bring any picture or sample, any decoration or piece of material, that lets the supplier see and touch what you like. The more concrete his impressions, the more easily he can put his ideas and experience at your disposal.

Don't make any final decisions until you see what's available, Winkler advises. The range of products is huge. Most people giving a party have a general concept of what they want, but not in exact details. Even for the exception who "knows exactly what he wants," a visit to the supplier may touch off creative ideas.

Winkler thinks one of your supplier's first questions should be: "Where's the party?" He also recommends finding someone who, like him, will make a no- obligation visit to your hall to see it for himself. No two venues are exactly alike.

Find a supplier with the widest possible range of products, says Mel Grevler of Party Supply Depot (905-764-5457). Strictly speaking, there's no such thing as one-stop for everything, but look for a place that's close and save yourself some shlepping.

Winkler holds a similar view. Choose a supplier who offers a full range of decor products, as well as accessories like sign-in boards and party machines for rental, he says.

Though Winkler himself specializes in bar mitzvahs, he doesn't set hard and fast rules about dealing with only one kind of customer. Many items that are good for a bar mitzvah will also work for, say, Purim. A supplier should be versatile.

Grevler advises knowing your budget before you go in. Look for fair, discounted prices, but not necessarily the cheapest. If a store is cheap on one item, he explains, they'll compensate by charging more on another. At the same time, in his view, a chain store can take advantage of economies of scale and pass on greater savings to you.

Important as the products are, Grevler and Winkler both put a high value on service. Staff, they say, should enjoy working with people.

Grevler considers expertise an integral part of service. The more diverse the range of product, the more expert a competent staff member must be. This means knowing what's available, what's trendy and what suits your party. There are trends in tableware, for example. To illustrate this, Grevler talks about napkins. For some time, he's imported European napkins; but he's seeing U.S. manufacturers working hard to catch up in quality.

Party supplies can be bulky and awkward to carry through a crowded mall. In Grevler's opinion, a store with convenient parking and loading space has a big asset, though it might not be the first thing you'd think of.

Grevler says experience has shown him that some people establish long-term relationships with reliable suppliers. A firm that served you well for a birthday is likely to do so for another party. If you decide to do this, choose a supplier who enjoys good connections with manufacturers.

Memories are captured in videos

By NOAM SUGARMAN
Special to The CJN

Only a video will be able to effectively remind us of how much fun we had at a party, says Andy Koltai, owner of Video Occasions (905-737-6800).

"After the music stops, and all the decorations are down, the video will still be there and always will."

Mark Beitel of Northern Memory Products (905-881-0608) says the quality of a video will suffer if recorded by an amateur.

"When you get someone professional, the lighting comes out properly, and that is what is most important," he said.

If professionally done, the final product is not shaky, and no aspect of the party is neglected, says Beitel.

"You get what you paid for," says Koltai. "If the person that is hosting the party just hands the camera to an amateur, then it is not important enough to them to have a special memory of their own function."

Beitel says there are a few very important elements of a videographer to be investigated before choosing one.

"Check the equipment that they're using, verify that it is broadcast quality. We use a mini-DV format, which is digital."

In terms of editing, Beitel's basic package includes SVHS editing. Digital editing is not necessary, he says. "People don't want all the bells and whistles of editing."

Koltai, on the other hand, believes that digital editing is essential to a quality video, and offers it in his basic packages.

"Having non-linear editing makes the final product crystal clear because the audio and video is digitally edited."

Koltai also believes that it is important to be able to burn the video on to DVD. "In the near future, every household will have a DVD player. The VHS will be out of the picture."

Koltai employs an all-wireless mike system for speeches and interviews because it eliminates background noise. He also does not like using tripods because it can disturb the party.

"I've never used a tripod on the dance-floor, except for speeches and candlelighting."

Videographer Andy Koltai from Video Occasions.

Beitel suggests that when deciding on a videographer, ask to see some of the work they've done. This way you have a firsthand view of the particular videographer's work.

Koltai recommends that one inquire "how long the videographer has been in this business." He also says that it is important to make sure that it is a full-time videographer.

According to Beitel, the videographer should know everything about the party beforehand. "If it's a wedding, we talk to the rabbi to find out about the order of things, and we will talk to the co-ordinator as well, so that we can know everything in advance."

Beitel also believes it is important to personally like the videographer. "Make sure they are personable. I think that is very important."

Koltai suggests booking a videographer at least six to eight months in advance. "If one waits too long, they likely won't find professionals available."

Beitel suggests booking a videographer around the same time that you book your party hall.

Choose a supplier who's up to date

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

There are two main advantages to one-stop party shopping. The first, of course, is convenience – the more items you pick up on one trip, the easier it is to manage logistics and organization.

Advantage number 2 is selection. Different as their wares are, Elaine Levison and Randi Basian of Geri's Eatin' Centre (416-445-5504), and Sam Cohen of Balloon Bash (905-707-8177), offer you the widest variety possible, and the most up-to-date selection.

And from loot bags to balloons, the product range today is vast. So, Cohen encourages you not to buy until you see what's available. Work out matters of budget and taste before you start shopping, but make specific purchase decisions on site.

Since the days of streamers taped to walls and ceilings, party decorating has come a long way.

Cohen even belongs to a network, the Qualitex Balloon Network, which suppliers have set up to ensure quality. To join, one must pass tests ranging from verbal exams to creating a balloon sculptures on site.

Balloons can add a lot to a party. Coloured in pastels and bright primaries or painted with laughing faces, balloons can float airily near the ceiling and symbolize good cheer and light-heartedness, Cohen says. It's hard to see a balloon without smiling.

While there's a lot of variety in individual balloons, people nowadays are also assembling them in sculptures. They are often quite large and complex, representing everything from bouquets to sports cars to dinosaurs.

As with balloons, so with food. The selection is enormous. Geri's Eatin' Centre carries specialty food and gift baskets and party snack trays, as well as bulk foods like chips, nuts, candy and salsas. They also stock courtesy items like welcome gifts for guests from out of town, and thank-you gifts to send party professionals after the event.

While product is important, it isn't everything. Levison puts a high value on service, which has three components – product expertise, ability to deal with people, and the creativity to tailor product and service to the individual customer.

Cohen sets high standards on customer service. This, for him, includes the ability to create something which fits the unique event, along with readiness to listen to you, the customer. Staff originality and ingenuity should be at your disposal.

And, Cohen insists, book a supplier who visits your hall, so he knows the setting for his artistry. Everything from ceiling height to panelling colour can make a difference.

Think of the work you may have to do, for instance, to brighten up an old-style hall which offers fine food and catering, but is somewhat behind the times visually.

Look for a party supplier, Cohen suggests, that offers lots of add-ons. Streamers to tie on your balloons

Don't let party treats become throw-aways

By ADAM SEGAL
CJN Intern

No matter how much money and thought you put into selecting party favours, many are left behind to be thrown out after the party.

Howard Levitt of LVT Photo Group (416-780-0111) and Simmie Antflick of Llama Nation (416-961-7440) suggest providing guests with party favours that have some tangible use.

"Give-aways become throw-aways," says Levitt, a weddings and bar/bat mitzvah photographer for 34 years. "People want novelty and value."

Levitt recently started giving out free calling cards adorned with a glossy picture of the man or woman of the hour, and says they are a hit with guests of all ages.

"People are just flipped out over this," he says. "It's not something that's going to be thrown away. There's true value in this."

The calling cards usually offer between 30 minutes and one hour of free calls and are handed out in the form of place cards, thank you cards, or even as sports cards.

Levitt has set up a digital sound studio that offers clients who purchase the hour-long cards the opportunity to leave a message thanking guests for attending. This is heard each time the card user dials up the card code.

"They usually say something like, 'Thank you for coming to my bar mitzvah. I hope you enjoy the card,'" Levitt says.

The photo on the front of the card is custom designed with digital and computer technology and Levitt welcomes input from parents in choosing the design format.

Antflick agrees that customized artwork makes for an innovative party favour.

Her company designs and hands out to guests VIP party passes that consist of a collage and polaroid snapshot of the guest laminated onto a thin plastic sheet. A thank you or welcome greeting can be inserted on the passes or a slot can be left for the guest to sign, depending on what the client desires.

"Kids absolutely love this," she says. "They think of it like a backstage pass and they're just lining up to collect them."

Antflick, who runs the business with the help of her son Elijah and his friend Danny Richmond, came across the pass idea when she noticed guests of the Toronto Film Festival were given VIP badges.

"I did [the passes] at my kids' parties and it turned into a business," she says.

Antflick emphasizes that the passes are colourful and portable, and with the artwork for the collage done ahead of time, guests only have to wait three minutes for the finished product. Clients are encouraged to brainstorm ideas for the collage or draw up their own design.

"Some kids have an artistic flair… so it's fun for [these] kids to get involved," she says.

The passes can either be clipped onto a shirt, worn as a necklace or simply hand held.

"It offers people an alternative to the usual party gifts and they get a lasting memento."

Calling cards, like these provided by LVT Photo Group, are a hit.

Call references when choosing a florist

Sometimes florists overbook events

By SIMONE JOSEPH
Staff Reporter

When getting a quote from a florist, make sure they tell you the whole cost, says Elaine Birnbaum, owner of Greenleaves & Petals (905-709-4080).

Sometimes, florists will tell a customer the cost of the centre-pieces without mentioning additional costs such as for the setup and take down of the arrangements, or of the prop rentals for items such as pedestals, candles, stands, fabrics, screens to divide a room or for artificial trees. So ask them for the full cost instead of just the cost of the flowers, she says.

Much of the cost associated with florists is for the labour. So if you are looking to cut costs, choose something that does not require as much work or setup, she says.

If you are operating on a tight budget and want a summery, fresh look, how about choosing something simple like a yellow pot filled with white daisies or floating flower heads in water with a few candles?

Sometimes, people who want that "just walked into the garden look" enjoy having a vase with cut flowers, Birnbaum said.

She warns party planners not to wait until the last minute to book their florist. Booking a florist early ensures that the florist will have the flowers you want and that you can book the florist you want.

Buyer beware: Sometimes, florists overbook events just to get the extra business, she said.

"Being in the industry, it is something you hear about. I've had numerous people coming at the last minute," she said.

People who come to her at the last minute from another florist have sometimes done so because the florist forgot about their event, or forgot about some other important information the customer thought the florist should have known.

So, it is important to be confident that the florist you book can handle the number of events they have, she said.

One way of checking this out is to call references to find out how a florist has fared at past events.

Book a florist who will communicate well with other party professionals, she advises. If, for example, your florist and decorator do not consult with each other, you risk them choosing a colour or style that do not match.

Do not be afraid of colour, Birnbaum says.

"Very often, people will have a certain idea that they cannot put colours together and when we show them, they realize how nice it is," she said.

As for party planners worried about family members or other guests who are allergic to flowers, Birnbaum suggests flowers without a strong scent, such as gerberas, snapdragons, orchids, or certain varieties of lilies.

"People tend not to opt for artificial flowers because they tend to want that fresh feeling," she said. Artificial flowers are also more costly, she added.

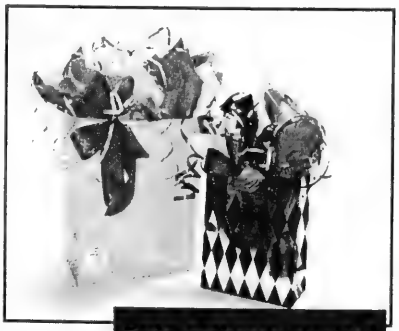
are an obvious example. It's also helpful if, in the same store, you find gift baskets, centrepieces, loot bags, stationery, cards, banners, confetti, and many kinds of giftware from mugs to plush toys.

Levison would look for a bright, cheerful store. This tells you the management wants to show the product in the best light, and make you feel welcome.

Levison, who has been in her business since 1979, advises you to choose an experienced supplier. You want someone who's up to date on the latest new ideas in the business. But, all other things being equal, someone who is an old hand at dealing with people will be more responsive to your ideas.



Party packages provided by Geri's Eatin' Centre.

And food should have esthetic appeal as well as flavour. "The sizzle sells the steak," as Levison puts it, "but it should also taste good."

"I'm not selling steaks, though," she hastens to add.

The busiest seasons for balloons, Cohen says, are Mother's Day, Valentine's Day, and the secular New Year; for gift baskets, Pesach and Rosh Hashanah.

Come at least three months ahead at these times, he says. When the trade is slower, one month ahead should be OK.

In the busy season, Levison advises, book as soon as you can; but choose a supplier who will work on short notice if the need arises. Prepare for the unexpected – anyone you hire or buy from should have the flexibility and resources to deal with it.

Consultants: a prescription for party stress relief

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

Big celebrations are happy occasions, but that doesn't make them less stressful. On the contrary: if you're organizing a party, the stress will probably increase in proportion to the size and importance of the event.

Fortunately, there are ways to minimize this stress. A party consultant can help you have "a worry-free affair and [look after] all your party needs," says Raquel Sananes-Grad (416-398-0217).

Both Sananes-Grad and Florence Wilder (416-222-2977) are experienced party and wedding consultants. Both offer insights into how to shift much of the burden of planning and organizing off your shoulders and onto theirs.

Sananes-Grad and Wilder agree on the qualities you should seek in any professional – integrity, commitment, knowledge of the field, experience and good organization. But while they concur on essentials, each brings her own unique outlook to her work.

Sananes-Grad, for example, emphasizes being a meticulous perfectionist, with a grasp of detail. After all, it's minutiae like timing and decor co-ordination that make your wedding or party an all-round success, she says.

Wilder, who has been a consultant for 13 years, advises you to find someone who networks well with other party professionals, from caterers to photographers. One of her most valuable services, she explains, is referrals. Recommending the right people is integral to her work, and she herself finds most of her clients through referrals.

Both Wilder and Sananes-Grad consider a calm, even temperament and the ability to handle pressure great assets. Sananes-Grad elaborates on this point, saying that a good consultant will detach herself from the situation and thus be more objective.

While your consultant has a professional interest in helping make your event a success, Sananes-Grad explains, she's not as emotionally involved as you are. To be good at her work, she has to be both a sounding board for your ideas and an intermediary among all those who have some say in the event. And she can do this better if she has a certain detachment.

Sananes-Grad practises what she preaches. When she got married, she hired a colleague.

Wilder says a good consultant is low-key, unobtrusive and in the background. You, after all, are the star at your event. At the same time, your consultant should be there when you need her.

Remember, though, that besides choosing a consultant, you have to work with her. She needs your input. So don't be shy, even about ideas which seem unconventional or difficult. A professional may find ways to make them real.

Sananes-Grad emphasizes the importance of a compatible personality. "You and your consultant have to click," she says.

A good consultant, Wilder says, is also a good listener – and a team player, who co-ordinates her work well with the other professionals at the party.

At weddings, Wilder tries to work not only with the bride, but with the entire bridal party. After all, they have an essential share in the celebration.

A good consultant, Wilder says, "makes you feel like a guest at your own wedding." And she does this by taking the worry off your shoulders, so that you can relax from time to time.

In Wilder's experience, every celebration, big or small, formal or casual, is unique. Accordingly, she advises seeking out a consultant who recognizes this, and works with you to help put your event in a class by itself.

Sananes-Grad stresses that your consultant should work closely with you from the beginning through all the planning stages. She herself stays at events

We asked some local party bands...

It probably isn't easy being a band leader. Every week, it seems, some new song becomes the flavour of the moment and whether he (or she) likes it or not, the band leader must listen to it over and over again so he can learn it and teach it to the rest of his band.

We asked some local bands what their three most requested songs are. Ricky Martin's Livin" La Vida Loca and Santana's Smooth seem to be the most popular. But, of course, other bands had completely different popular requests. Bands that specialize in traditional music, for example, or klezmer bands are bound to have different requests.

With this in mind, here is the result of our first non-scientific band leaders poll.

Isle of Sark perfect for honeymooners

By RACHEL ALKALLAY
Special to The CJN

A fairy tale, medieval-style castle exists on a little known, but easily accessible island at the gateway to Europe.

Located on the Isle of Sark, one of the smallest of the Channel Islands in the English Channel, the castle belongs, appropriately, to the feudal baron who governs Sark with a benign hand.

The castle grounds are complete with a red-topped dovecote, where pairs of cooing, lovestruck white doves congregate in contentment. Mist-shrouded gardens lined with rhododendron encircle a lake inhabited by several varieties of ducks. A carefully planted vegetable and herb garden is located on the other side of the castle grounds, with brightly blooming flowers smiling between the patches of food plants.

This castle, unfortunately, is not available to honeymoon couples, but several other contemporary hotels on the island are, capitalizing on the area's misty, flower-laden appeal.

Sark's charm lies in the fact that its medieval look is combined with modern amenities. No cars are permitted on the 3½ x 5 mile island, a fact on which the Sarkese pride themselves. Romantic horse-and-buggy conveyances are available for hire, as are bicycles. Tractors race around the island, but they are not for hire.

Walking is the best way to explore the nooks and crannies of this dot of land, which is loyal to the British Crown although it lies 14 miles off the coast of France. You can follow the dirt paths along the baronial estate, as horses and cows graze peacefully in the distance. Arbours of trees create natural ceilings along the routes. Meet the local hound casually guarding the grounds. Or notice the farm-hands, with faces out of old masters' paintings.

Medieval look, modern amenities

Romantic gifts are available along Sark's main street. A perfumerie stocked with expensive European scents does a brisk business. A little further on, a Sark glass-blower has set up his wares in a charming shop peopled with mouth-blown mushrooms, paperweights, candleholders and cups.

The saleslady explains that the glass-blower is not a native Sarkese. When he was at art school in England, he met a native Sark girl, married her, and moved to Sark. This is just about the only way one can live permanently on the island of 560 – marry a native.

Sample home-made ice cream (made with real Sark milk, according to its ads) bought at the local bakery or at the small supermarket, or sample the home-made bread and muffins.

Walk along the harbour and marvel at the construction along its sturdy cliffs as waves pound the rocks. Watch out for the cranes and the ubiquitous tractors going back and forth along the slippery path.

Tides are influential in determining the number of boats with tourists arriving each day for visits. Arrivals may be cancelled for days at a time if the weather is cross.

The ability to put its visitors into an utterly relaxing mood within minutes of their arrival makes Sark worth more than the cursory half-day tour recommended in guidebooks.

Because of its Lilliputian size, Sark is one of the few places on earth that can be completely explored in a few days, perfect for honeymooners dividing their time between sightseeing and wrapping themselves in each other's company

The easiest way to get to Sark is by flying to London, then hopping a flight to the isles of Jersey or Guernsey, and from there taking one of several tour boats bound for multiple tours of Sark, Guernsey, the Isle of Herm and the coast of France.

Bands can inject great energy into your party

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Sound quality, showmanship and rapport with the crowd are three key qualities of a great band, according to Larry Rodness, leader of the Larry Rodness Band (416-650-5858).

Rodness, whose eight-piece band includes his wife, singer Jody Glassman, says a band leader should be constantly gauging the crowd.

Rick Levine Band Left, Russ Myers above.

"He needs to be able to switch gears quickly. He always has to know what is required next, so there is no energy lost," he says.

Every party has a mixture of people, and the band leader can only judge what is needed when he sees people on the dance floor. The band has to switch quickly from top 40 to standard rock and roll to Jewish tunes – whatever is needed at the moment," Rodness says.

Russ Myers, of the Russ Myers Band (905-771-0257), agrees. People have a strong connection to music, and a band can inject a tremendous amount of energy into the party, he says.

"A band should involve the guests. A performer has to get out into the crowd and get people to sing along. We've even had a singer sing on a table – as long as the guests are happy. Each party has a dynamic of its own."

For the same reason, the band also needs to be sensitive to its volume, so that people can talk to each other easily, especially during the meal, says Meyers, a keyboard player and singer. "Its important for the band to have a monitoring system so players can hear themselves during the performance."

Rick Levine, of the Rick Levine Band (905-881-6400), says that with current technology, bands can be very affordable. "Digital sound can be used to enhance a two- or three-piece band. There is a lot of versatility now. We can bring a keyboard player with a tremendous amount of digital sound, a saxophone player and a vocalist, and make it sound like an eight-piece band."

Levine, who also offers a disc jockey service, says the two can work together to offer a unique combination of music. "With a disc jockey and a band at a party, the adults and the kids are happy. One plays while the other is on a break, and that way, everyone hears the music they like to hear."

It is essential for band members to have a rapport with each other, Myers says. "If people in the band are having fun with each other, that feeling is projected into the crowd. They can tell if we genuinely enjoy playing."

Band leaders performing at a Jewish function should understand that the party needs a Jewish tam, says Myers. "A horah often gets people going and offers a spiritual energy to the event. It is also an inclusive dance – everyone can dance to it, whether or not they have a partner. There is a built-in kindness to it."

Levine suggests hearing a band before booking it for your party. "That does not mean that you have to go out to another wedding and listen to it. We have a CD and a video of our music, and an interactive Web Site – rick@torontopartyguide.com – or you can hear a live performance at a party showcase. Look for a band with a solid, tight sound and a good beat."

If you do go out to a party to hear the band, make sure you audition the band and not the crowd, Rodness says. "A band may be playing a certain type of music because that is what the hosts requested. Different parties demand different types of music. Listen to the quality of the music and how the crowd reacts to the band. That is what's important."

Flowergirl's dress should suit her personality and her figure

By SHERYL HALPERN
Special to The CJN

Call her a flower girl. Call her a junior bridesmaid. Whatever you call her, she's thrilled to be part of a real wedding, with a real bride and a real groom.

While everyone else is caught up in wedding planning craziness (Do we have the band yet? When do we mail the invitations to the States?), she focuses on the main event. She's going to watch people getting married.

For that she'll need the perfect dress – something special in beautiful tulles or satins, sprinkled with lace or pearls, but not too fussy. Get ready to go shopping.

Begin by asking the bride what she wants your daughter to wear. Should you look for particular styles or shades? Should the dress have puffed sleeves or cap sleeves – or long sleeves? Should the hemline be "tea-length" (translation: calf-length) or ankle-length? If your daughter is not the only flower girl, do the girls have to wear matching outfits?

Do your research by skimming through a few bridal magazines for ideas. Then visit a few stores in the bridal district before bringing your flower girl along. (That way you'll cut down on dressing-room fatigue.)

What's out there is very princessy. Look for full-skirted dresses elegantly sashed at the waist, and A-lines that flare out with just a little crinoline.

The bodices, puffy sleeves and skirts are sprinkled with lace appliques, sequins and tiny pearls, or accented with tucking, bows or rosettes, and perhaps a few ruffles. There's lots of white and ivory, touched with rum pink (a very light pastel pink), in tulles and silks and matte satins.

Don't get too frou-frou, though. A flower girl should not resemble a wedding cake. Don't go for too many flounces and rosettes – and go easy on the crinolines. Remember what her dress looked like after the High Holy Days? Before you ask to have that elaborate ensemble with rows and rows of ruffles wrapped up for her, picture it after she's attacked the sweet table and climbed up on the bandstand.

Don't get too sophisticated, either. If your flower girl is under age seven or eight, find her an outfit that is easy to put on and to wear. If you have an older flower girl (oh, pardon – junior bridesmaid), she should have a dress that doesn't look like a cut-down version of a bridesmaid's gown.

Buy a dress to suit her figure – and her personality. If dresses with full skirts and wide sashes at the waist don't look right on your robust daughter, find a stylish A-line that skims her tummy and hips. If satin appliques and frills don't suit your tomboy, buy a dress that emphasizes cut and fabric.

Don't buy her dress too far ahead – or buy one that can accommodate a growth spurt. (She may not outgrow it, but a dress that fits her perfectly in January is going to need to be let out or let down by June.)

Don't pay more for the dress than you plan to pay for her wedding. This is a one-time-only outfit, made for memories, not a lot of wear. It probably won't fit her when she's bat mitzvah, and it definitely won't fit her when she's Sweet Sixteen.

You don't have to have imported silk or lace. You can look at bridal wholesalers and discounters for something exquisite, but not too extravagant.

Think about accessories. Will she be carrying a basket of petals or a bouquet? Will she be wearing a circlet of flowers on her hair or nothing at all? Make sure you have a slip so that the crinoline doesn't get too scratchy (or look for a sewn-in slip). Get matching shoes and a pair of stockings. (Make that two pairs of stockings, just in case.)

If you want your relatives and friends to talk to you after the wedding, you also have to explain how a flower girl should behave at a weddaing ceremony. (You really don't want her to feature too prominently in the wedding video – and there's no time-out corner under the chupah.)

Keep it simple: Flower girls don't talk or whisper – and they try not to fidget. They don't sit down on the stairs to the bimah or run down the aisle. They just get dressed up in their prettiest-ever dresses – and smile!

Photography captures the true emotion of the day

By NOAM SUGARMAN
Special to The CJN

When choosing a photographer for a party, important characteristics to look for are charm, honesty and straightforwardness, says Adrian Holmes of Adrian Holmes Photography (905-479-6569).

Photographs make a big difference in how you will remember your party, Holmes says. "Photography captures the true emotion of the day."

To get the best results, it is essential to have a good rapport with your photographer, he says. "Your relationship with the photographer is not something that goes on for an hour or two. It can sometimes last up to a few years."

The process of choosing a photographer should therefore not be taken lightly. "It is definitely something that is worth the effort. Start by getting referrals from friends, consultants and other industry people."

It is also important to check out the quality of the photographer's work for yourself, Holmes says. "Simply looking at samples from the company can go a long way in helping you make your decision."

For your photographer to do his best work, you should provide him with information about the party as early as possible. "It definitely helps to have an itinerary, or if it's a kids' party and there's a theme, to be told in advance. Knowing these things helps the photographer decide on how he or she can approach the party," Holmes says.

Interaction between the photographer and guests should be relatively limited, he says. "Make sure the photographer is not intimidating and not too obtrusive. You should remember the photographer by the pictures, not by how he is carrying on at the party."

In terms of what's in style for photography now, "the trend seems to be 'what's old is new.' People are opting for a more free style of photography. Black and white photos have also become more popular lately," Holmes says.

He advises booking a photographer at least a year before the party. "A good rule of thumb is to book the photographer at the same time as the party hall."

Buying kids' clothes shouldn't wear you out

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

When you're thinking about parties and celebrations, kids' clothing enters the picture in two ways – as gifts and as apparel for the occasion itself.

The speed at which kids grow, the fickle shifts of fashion, the cost of new clothes and your child's response to peer pressure may make the subject seem daunting.

In fact, it's not that scary. Barb Davis of Previously Loved (416-516-3613) and Santina Mariani of Zero 20 Bambini (905-851-6041) carry a variety of clothing from quality used items to designer sportswear and special occasion wear. Here, they offer some hints that will help you clothe your kids.

Before you visit any store, Davis urges, know what you want. List your priorities – looks, durability, design and condition.

Then look for quality, service, and a wide selection, Mariani recommends. And, of course, consult your child.

Mariani says American brands like Ralph Lauren, Polo, Guess and Fila are still "in." So are French labels like Miniman, which now has a girls' selection too. Catimini, although mainly for girls, now has boys' clothing as well.

Styles are more diverse than ever. You'll find everything from a business suit to ball gowns to flower girl dresses for a wedding march.

Mariani sees style as a way for a child to express personality. Even on special occasions, for instance, a robust, rough-and-tumble girl wants different clothes than one who enjoys frilly dresses. And a child may need different styles for the same occasion – say, a suit for a bar mitzvah service and something casual for the party after.

For rough-and-tumble clothes, Mariani says, all you need worry about is price and durability. Since kids are hard on clothes in any case, durability is a major consideration for every garment.

Look for quality, service and selection

Davis and Mariani agree that the stigma attached to second-hand clothes is disappearing. Looks and quality matter more than newness. For one thing, people are more environmentally aware and less willing to waste perfectly good articles. Because kids grow fast, even the sturdiest clothes need replacing every few years; why not pass them on to someone who can use them? And the economic slowdown a few years ago reinforced a good idea that's always in style: get value for your money. Since then, quality used clothing outlets have become common.

When buying second-hand, Davis advises, avoid clothes with worn patches that will soon fray through, and make sure that buttons, zippers and snaps are in good working order. Defective items are a false economy.

Most second-hand stores, Davis says, have some good stuff, and people with an eye for a bargain take pride in an unusually good find. The problem with many such stores, though, is the stacks of not-so-good stuff you have to sort through to find the treasures. Accordingly, Davis advises choosing a store that carries only the best second-hand merchandise, or at least does the sorting for you. This saves time and tells you that the merchant is selling service along with the product.

Buy a few quality items, Mariani urges, rather than a huge quantity. You get what you pay for. Cotton pyjamas at $29, for example, last till a child outgrows them; acrylic pyjamas at $5 will have baggy knees in a few months. Many a rueful customer has fallen for such a "bargain" – once.

Mariani places a high value on integrity and reputation. If a merchant doesn't carry what you need, she should be willing to refer you to someone who does. Better no sale now and a good name in the long run, than a one-time sale to a disgruntled parent who votes with her feet, takes her dollars to another store and tells her friends to do likewise.

And in case your kid dislikes something or it doesn't fit, Davis recommends choosing a store with a return-and-refund policy. Sometimes you can avoid these problems by bringing your child with you, but that's not always possible.

Should you bring kids at all? Some children look forward to coming with you to help you choose. For others, going through all those stacks and racks is a big bore; they'd rather be outside playing. What it comes down to, Davis says, is that you have to do whatever works for you as a parent.

Buffet is less expensive than a sit-down meal

By SIMONE JOSEPH
Staff Reporter

If you are planning a party on a tight budget, two areas you might cut back on are alcohol and the sweet table, says Joe Elmaleh of King Solomon's Catering (416-630-0666)

For luncheons, sometimes just wine and beer are served – a cheaper option than providing an open bar. Also, serving a nice dessert following a meal might be sufficient rather than offering a sweet table, which is more expensive, says the managing partner of King Solomon's Catering.

Another cost-cutting measure is providing a buffet. It is less expensive than a sit-down meal and can be quite elegant, he says.

"You can have a very elaborate, up-scale buffet."

While people often worry that buffets involve waiting in tiresome line-ups, Elmaleh says having several food stations, like large salad stations, a pasta bar, an Israeli food station and a Chinese food station spread around the room can speed up lines.

"If you do it properly and spread out the buffets, the wait is not there," Elmaleh says.

About half of the luncheons King Solomon's Catering provides are buffets while only about 25 percent of dinners are buffets, he says.

When looking for the right caterer, Elmaleh suggests speaking to past customers of the company you are considering and attending one or two simchahs catered by them.

Allan Brearley, owner of Fine Touch Catering Inc., (905-889-2690 ext. 2117) suggests hiring what he terms a "full-service caterer," someone who will handle rentals of equipment (such as dishes, linens, tables), recommend other professionals, such as decorators or florists, and help you find the right venue.

Hiring a caterer with many contacts in the party industry will make party planning much easier, he says.

"If you can deal with just one person, it takes away a lot of the stress of having a party."

A delicious spread by Fine Touch Catering Inc.

A party catered by Peter Graben Fine Foods Ltd.

Mat Reime, general manager of Peter Graben Fine Foods Ltd. (416-510-1818), says finding a caterer with experience is important.

"Sometimes, chefs can talk a good game but… if they are putting out two or three hundred dinners and there are four or five courses, you need food service experience," he says.

Also, make sure you choose a caterer that listens.

"Anybody can cook. The question is do they cook what you want? When the function is over, can you say this is exactly what you wanted?" Reime says.

Vera Wang

Dress yourself up like a princess

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Streamlined gowns made of quality silk are what makes Vera Wang creations known worldwide, says Carole Rosenstein, co-owner of Hugo Nicholson (416-927-9094).

"Posh Spice, Jane Fonda, Mariah Carey and Al Gore's daughter Karenna, have all worn Vera Wang wedding gowns," says Rosenstein, who with her sister Elanore, runs the only Vera Wang salon in Canada.

Wang, the youngest person to have been made editor of the American edition of Vogue magazine, went on to work for Ralph Lauren before opening her own salon in 1990. "Her formal, floor-length gowns, which usually have a chapel-like train, are not adorned with bells and whistles. They are clean and body conscious, and are often in ivory with a cream cast – just a notch off the starkness of white," Rosenstein says.

A "classic" Wang gown, made of silk organza and silk shantung, features a fitted princess bodice and scoop neckline with small cap sleeves, richly piped in silk shantung. A cummerbund defines the waist in back, and a draped bow with an array of silk roses cascades into a full organza skirt.

A silk satin gown with a halter neckline and dropped waist trimmed with dainty pearls, has floral accents that "add allure to the gown," Rosenstein says.

By the time a client comes in to try on a Vera Wang creation, she says, they should have looked at other gowns, "so they can feel the difference."

A trunk show, to be held in August, will feature about 100 sample gowns. "This gives the buyer a chance to make an appointment and view the whole Wang collection," Rosenstein says.

She suggests that brides come in about six to eight months before the wedding, to give ample time for alterations.

Buying a Jewish wedding gift? Think tradition

By ABIGAIL PICKUS
JUF News

When Hava and Adam Holzhauer got married three years ago, they received a curious package from a relative. It was heavy. It was large. It was a stone bust of Moses.

"It looks like it was carved out of a mountain. It's huge and ridiculous," said Hava, who lives with Adam and their toddler son near Chicago.

Moses, however, who is carrying the Ten Commandments in his hands, has been situated in a place of honour: on top of an armoire in the main room.

"It's like Moses is looking down on us all," said Hava.

Ah, to receive an unusual Jewish wedding gift! After all, how many mezuzot can a couple get? "Well, we got 13 mezuzot," said Hava, adding that only half of them came with the claff, the parchment that is to go inside.

(Word to the wise: when giving a mezuzah case, go ahead and throw in the claff, the couple will thank you for it.)

So what is the buzz on the street when it comes to Jewish wedding gifts? It seems that, busts of Moses aside, Jewish wedding gifts haven't changed that much since the days of old. Sure, you can plan your whole Jewish wedding through the guidance of a CD-ROM. And true, the father-in-law typically doesn't throw in some chickens once the bridegroom has agreed to the match.

But when the time comes to buy a happy couple a gift, people are still venturing into Judaica stores – although they can order practically everything online – and buying everything from books and music to jewelry and Jewish ritual objects – mezuzot, seder plates, Kiddush cups and challah covers.

In fact, many Judaic retailers have seen a strong return to tradition, especially among young couples.

"Young people are definitely going back to tradition," said Terri Morris, who has managed the Hamakor Gallery Ltd. in Skokie, Ill., for the past 11 years.

"The tendency seems to be less avant garde, more traditional. More like the kinds of things your grandparents would have had."

In fact, Morris has seen a return to giving tzedakah boxes – pushkes – as a way for a new couple to make giving a part of their life together.

"We have some beautiful tzedakah boxes that are replicas of synagogues throughout the world," said Morris. Beyond that, anything by artist Gary Rosenthal, who works in metals like brass and copper, is very popular.

At Rosenblum's World of Judaica in Chicago, owner Avrom Fox has seen some different trends among young married couples.

Currently, every couple wants an artistic ketubah, the marriage contract. Whether a lithograph or a commissioned piece of art, couples value the ketubah as an official reminder of the legality of their Jewish marriage.

"It's becoming almost a given that couples buy these artistic ketubot, frame them, and hang them on the wall," said Fox.

Their popularity can be measured in numbers: This past year, Fox estimates they sold several hundred ketubot, while 10 years ago, they sold a few dozen.

"Twenty to 40 years ago, these kinds of ketubot were not available. People had to pay upwards of $2,000 for a custom-made one, which is why there are scores of these beautiful lithographs that almost look original," he said.

Rosenblum's offers a selection of nearly 200 lithographs representing dozens of artists from around the country. Some are limited edition lithographs, and all are customized for the couples. A lithograph can cost between $100 and $300.

On a more sociological note, Fox has seen a melding of denominational lines when it comes to traditional practices.

It's never too early to book a consultant until the sweet table opens, in case she's needed.

Wilder says a consultant should be ready for anything. To this end, she comes to every event armed with a "contingency kit," filled with everything from bandages to different coloured socks.

Book your consultant as early as you can, Wilder urges – a year, even 18 months in advance. Sananes-Grad advises booking as soon as you know the date of your event. Do so before you hire any other party professional, she adds, so that you can take advantage of the referrals she can offer.

Not that consultants won't work on short notice, if they can, they say. The earlier you book, though, the fewer the disappointments and the more likely you are to find your preferred person available for the date you want; and one of the best ways to minimize stress is not being in too much of a hurry.

The evolution of tradition through history

By ROBIN MORDFIN
Special to JUF News

Many couples are so caught up in modern times they don't take the time to understand the history of the ceremonies surrounding their wedding.

With computer-engraved wedding invitations, e-mail RSVPs, and the four Cs of diamond buying, today's brides and grooms often forget that many of the rituals they prize are remnants of old and valued traditions.

Marriage is the central event in the Jewish life cycle, a big ceremony surrounded by many smaller ones. In past times, the ceremonies included engagements, the negotiation of dowries and a formal betrothal.

Today, while some of these are still extant, modern customs have been added – like showers and rehearsal dinners. Yet they all seem to be related.

Just as in the distant past, today's marriage cycle begins with a proposal. According to Jewish tradition, the bride must receive and accept a proposal in order for a wedding to take place, even for those marriages that are arranged.

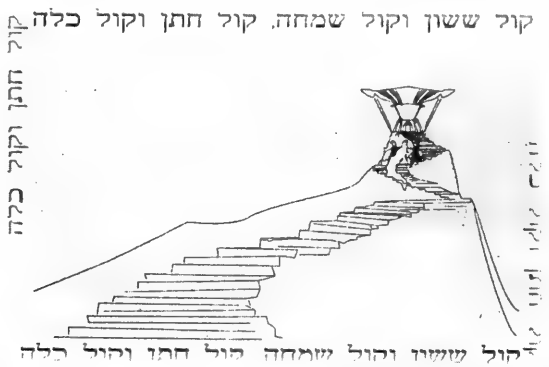

Illustration by Edward Dunbar

"It's considered very improper to marry without a proposal," said Rabbi Yosef Bechhofer of Bais Tefillah Congregation in Illinois. "There has to be a proposal and a consent."

And just like today, it has long been customary for the groom to give the bride a gift of value, or for both bride and groom to exchange gifts such as clothing, jewelry and fruit.

In ancient and medieval times, the engagement was formalized in a betrothal ceremony known as shidduchin, at which the terms of the marriage were formulated in a document called the tena'im.

The tena'im included when and where the wedding would take place, the terms of the dowry, and other conditions, such as how long the bride's father would support the couple. And, because it was a binding agreement, the tena'im included the damages either side would have to pay should the engagement be broken.

Breaking an engagement was much more serious in talmudic times than it is today. In fact, the procedure for release was so difficult that it was not uncommon for rabbis to suggest that the wedding take place so that the couple could be given a get – a Jewish divorce.

Today, the tena'im are normally signed on the day of the wedding, so that problems with damages and dowry are no longer an issue.

Decorations provide atmosphere

Grevler highlights one advantage of these connections. Besides regular products, your supplier will be able to get test-market items. This adds to the variety of products you can choose from and may put you at the forefront of a decor trend.

Good service should be offered even on short notice, but Winkler advises choosing your supplier a year in advance. Grevler suggests booking a month or more ahead. This cuts down worry, especially when it comes to ordering items that may be in short supply.

Choosing your decor supplier entails more than meets the eye, and a wise choice may ensure that what meets your guests' eyes when they enter the hall will be recalled with pleasure long after the simchah.

Wedding rituals are based on tradition

Yet, in some more observant communities, the practice of having a party to celebrate a couple's engagement, called a vort, often with divrei Torah as part of the celebration, has become more common.

For those couples that survived the engagement rites, the next step on the road to matrimony then and now is the betrothal, the erusin, which used to take place a year before the wedding. From the erusin until the wedding, the couple was considered bound together in every respect except that they did not live together and the groom was not yet obligated to support the bride.

"Families needed a year to prepare their children for marriage," Rabbi Bechhofer explained. "They had to prepare a trousseau for the bride. They had to prepare a house for the couple."

Today, extended family and friends still help the couple furnish their new home, but household necessities are often provided through bridal showers and department store registries.

And because, as the 11th and 12th centuries passed, Jews around the world were living in increasingly turbulent times, the betrothal ceremony frequently became connected to the wedding.

The decision was made because the possibility that a betrothed couple might be separated had become a strong reality, which would leave them both unmarried yet unable to marry anyone else.

So, as it has been since medieval times, the betrothal is now separated from the wedding ceremony only by the reading of the marriage contract – the ketubah – under the chupah.

Traditional gifts making a comeback

He cites the popularity among Jews from all religious backgrounds of the bride buying a tallit for her bridegroom.

"Denominational lines have fallen down for certain basic traditions," said Fox. "There is a resurgence in general in Jewish knowledge and in an understanding of who we are as a people."

An interesting trend, according to Fox, is commissioning an artist to put the broken glass from the wedding ceremony inside a mezuzah. Although the glass stomped upon by the groom during the ceremony is considered a reminder of the destruction of the Temple, some people interpret the glass as a sign of joy.

"It's a symbol of good luck," said Fox, who added that there is no halachic basis to this custom.

Eileen Braun, manager of the Bariff Shop for Judaica at the Spertus Institute of Jewish Studies in Chicago, has seen customers coming in for everything from the more traditional pieces to one-of-a-kind, commissioned work, like the ever-popular ketubot.

An unusual item that Braun says is quite popular is something called the "community wedding ring." The ring, which has a spice box on top in the shape of a house or castle, comes from Israel. It costs from $60 to $200, depending on the size and style.

Such a community ring is representative of the reality of shtetl life a couple of hundred years ago, when needy families who could not afford to buy a wedding ring had access to a communal ring.

The Bariff shop also offers a variety of Judaic wedding bands, from the very traditional to the more contemporary, with different Hebrew verses etched into it. (Traditionally, wedding bands are not supposed to be pierced in any way, so that the bride will know for sure that the band, a symbol that the wedding contract will be fulfilled, is pure gold.)

Mishaps make weddings memorable

By SID SINGER
JUF News

Shmuel – we'll keep his last name private – had a memorable wedding. Sure, everyone thinks his or her wedding is unforgettable. But this was really memorable.

"I started walking down the aisle, I looked up, and there was no chupah there," he says.

What?

"They had just remodelled the hall. We were the first wedding to take place there since the remodelling. The caterer didn't think about it. The hall didn't think about it," says Shmuel.

With the flowers and a skylight up front, none of the guests sitting in the room noticed it, either. Fortunately, the groom had packed his tallit to use the next morning. His cousin ran to get it, and four people held up the corners of the makeshift chupah.

The story, which took place in 1991, has a mythological side, according to Shmuel.

"My grandfather says he saw it first, my father says he saw it first. But I saw it first," he says.

The anecdote illustrates the unspoken, dark side of weddings: when things go wrong. Families plan weddings for months, the bride and groom can pay attention to every last detail, but sometimes, there's just no stopping more powerful forces. When that happens, the best defence is just a good sense of humour.

Take Carrie Kaye's experience, for example: "A squirrel came into the hotel during the changeover of the room from the ceremony to the reception," says Kaye, a wedding coordinator, of a wedding she did last year. None of the guests were in the room at the time.

"All the catering staff, some of the musicians, and I were trying to not kill the squirrel but get it out of the room," says Kaye, who handles 30 to 40 weddings per year. Finally, a waiter used a broom to scare the squirrel and it ran out a back door. "That was fun," she says.

Of course, it wasn't her wedding. Nature's impact on a wedding usually takes the more familiar form of weather. Heavy snow began falling on the Sunday that Nathan and Michal Fox were getting married in January 1996.

A quarter of the 400 expected guests didn't make it. In all, over 30 centimetres of snow would fall, leaving many of those who did make it stranded at the hotel for the night. The groom's parents, Barbara and Jack Fox, sponsored a lox and bagel breakfast for everyone the next morning.

Among those stranded were professionals who had worked the wedding, who, like many wedding guests, had no change of clothes. At the breakfast sat 150 people, including stranded guests, the photographers, and the band – all in their tuxedos.

Also present at the breakfast were many of the electricians brought in by the hotel to maintain the power lines. As Barbara was nearing the breakfast room, out walked the uninvited workers wearing jeans, boots, and hard hats, carrying plates full of food. Said one of them to Barbara, "Hey, lady, go in there, the food's free!"

"I just laughed and went in," says Barbara. The wedding united more than just the bride and groom, adds Barbara. "We had people staying at the hotel Saturday night who didn't know each other. They're real close friends now."

At least the power didn't go out at the Fox wedding; other weddings hit by snow haven't been so lucky. David Allswang, an attorney with Piper Marbury Rudnick & Wolfe, recalls a wedding that he attended. The family went to great lengths to make a memorable affair, but a heavy snowstorm hit the area that day.

Guests began leaving early as the word circulated that the airport would close. Then the power went out, leaving no lights in the room and – worse for the party – no band.

"Some guys tried to sing [Jewish songs] at a high decibel, but...," Allswang didn't need to finish his sentence.

The unexpected events at Allswang's own wedding, which took place in 1991, had a different spin. A beauty pageant was conducting a promotion in the hotel that weekend.

Mrs. United States (she was married) and Miss Universe were in the lobby, ribbons and all. Some of the guests found time to meet the beauty queens. Were they taking pictures with her?

"Yes," says Allswang. Did Allswang take a picture with her? "I have a picture with her, yes."

Adam Fishman has been to a lot of weddings, first as a singer with two local bands and now with his own band, Nefesh.

Often the band must deal with last-minute situations when a musician can't make it or when the instruments blow a fuse. Once, however, the music stopped but the lights didn't go out, signaling that a fuse hadn't blown. Fishman looked around and saw a boy standing behind the stage. The boy had pulled out the plug. "The kid was a folk hero" after that, says Fishman.

What did he do about it? "I plugged it back in," he says.

Moving to the rhythms of joy at Jewish weddings

The 1990s saw rock supersede pop, but for weddings it's rock with a Jewish 'tam'

By ARIELLA PALMER
Special to JUF News

Wedding ceremonies are bound by ritual and custom, but when it comes to rejoicing, tradition yields to trend.

As musical tastes change, so do the dances that go with them. While Jewish weddings often feature conventional dancing, they are increasingly adding Jewish music and, by extension, Jewish dancing, to their agenda.

Fifty years ago, wedding guests circled the bride and groom to ruach music learned at summer camps and based on an idealized view of pioneering Israel. As Jews felt more linked to Israel, Israeli music became more popular and Israeli folk dancing was taught at summer camps and simchahs.

Israeli folk dances relinquished the floor when klezmer music made a comeback along with American Jews' renewed interest in their grandparents' eastern European experience.

Klezmer gave way to chassidish pop when disco commandeered the music scene. The 1990s saw rock supercede pop, but for weddings it's rock with a Jewish tam.

Simchah dancing, according to some, became the rage at the hippest of weddings, beginning in the '90s. Look carefully, however, and adults who learned Israeli folk dancing at summer camps in the '60s will see Shaftu mayim, grapevine and debka steps speeded up to match the pop/rock beat.

The net effect is arm-swinging, feet-moving, heart-beating and cheek-reddening Jewish line dancing. It's a lot of fun for those who know the sometimes complicated combinations. And it's fun to watch for those who don't know the steps or are too self-conscious to get on the dance floor.

Popular at Orthodox affairs where a mechitzah sometimes separates men and women on the dance floor, simchah dancing allows women who love to move to get around without the restraint of oblivious or inexperienced partners.

Dancers move as individuals in rows or lines without holding hands. While the dancers are constantly in motion, the combinations repeat themselves with dynamic regularity so that someone with a fast eye and faster feet can follow along.

While some yeshiva boys learn steps with their rebbes, the complex simchah dancing more often happens on the women's side.

Largely choreographed in New York, simchah dancing reaches Chicago on videos and through the teaching of women like Janet Shapiro and Ava Nussbaum in Skokie and Malkie Goldberg in West Rogers Park.

All three are popular guests at simchahs where hosts want the assurance that guests who are less sure of themselves will have a good dancer to follow.

"People love to have a good time at parties. If people get up to dance, they have more fun," Nussbaum says. "What is a party? You eat, drink and dance. If I can get five or six people who know the steps, I can get other people up dancing."

"One or two quick lessons and you can have a good time," says Goldberg, who teaches a few generic steps to brides or nervous parents who haven't danced in many years. "My philosophy is that you just need the confidence to go on the floor. Once you get there, anything goes."

Goldberg's twice-weekly classes attract women who want a good aerobic exercise workout as much as they want to dance at a party.

Nussbaum and Goldberg agree that interest at weddings in really complicated choreography has waned. Guests are more likely to do tried and true steps, but that hasn't stopped teachers from learning new steps to teach women in their classes.

Her most devoted women, says Goldberg, "will give up meetings to come dancing." Others will come for a few lessons prior to an important simchah.

It's not that men can't learn the steps, Shapiro says. "Men are picking up a couple of the dances and they do it in their manly way. If they took the time to take lessons, it would be more enjoyable for them than just going around in circles."

Has Israeli dancing disappeared? Hardly, says Phil Moss, director of the Nitzanim Israeli Folk Dance Troupe, but it doesn't look like it did in the 1950s.

"Israeli dancing is a recreational dance form based on Israeli culture. It is centred in Israel and Israel accepts music from all over the world. Usually there's some Hebrew in it, but not always. New choreography is coming out all the time as new music comes out. It's not a pure form. It is an entertainment form now, not a folk form."

Dance or music? Music or dance? Which is more important to a celebration?

"A band that connects with the soul of the party can get people to dance," says Stuart Rosenberg. "Those who have a gift for expressing their joy physically are going to find cool ways to do it and they will set trends."

Whatever the dance and music trends in North American society, where Jews come together to be joyous there will always be music and dance.

Elbow grease, inspiration go into homemade chupahs

By ANDY ALTMAN-OHR
Jewish Bulletin of Northern California

Making one's own chupah may add to the stress of wedding preparation, but several Bay Area couples say it also offers a tremendous amount of inner satisfaction.

"It was part of what I needed to feel a real sense of connection with the ceremony," Shoshana Klein said. "What we created is priceless. It's a huge, hand-sewn, amazing piece of art. It's going to be the family heirloom. We created the family heirloom."

Klein and her husband, Keith Weinstein, were married in August at the Brazil Room in Berkeley's Tilden Park underneath the chupah they created — painstakingly and sometimes agonizingly — together.

From the initial planning stages to its completion, the chupah took the Oakland couple about 13 months to create. Toward the latter stages of the project, they worked on it just about every night for 2-1/2 months.

"When she first said, 'Let's make our own chupah,' I said, 'All right,'" Weinstein said.

"I guess I didn't really know what it was going to take: coming home almost every night of the week, sitting down and sewing. Before this, I had never even sewn anything substantial."

The couple started the project by importing ivory-white Doupioni silk from India — a friend shipped it over — for the background. For their design, they decided on an Eitz Chayim, or Tree of Life.

Onto a 7-foot by 13-foot piece, they sewed their elaborately planned design: a cabernet-coloured tree trunk along with red, gold and olive leaves — 54 to be exact. All of them had to be traced and cut out of smaller swatches of silk that they had meticulously selected.

"That's a lot of leaves," Weinstein said, noting that 99 percent of the sewing was done by hand.

The most difficult task proved to be the border, which was sewn from ribbon and a piece of heavyweight silk. At that point, thinking they might run out of time, the couple brought in an expert.

"The seamstress is what really helped us turn the corner," said Weinstein, noting that they finished with three weeks to spare.

"I thought I was going to be suicidal, it got so frustrating at times," Klein said. "The Doupioni was very difficult to sew; it's raw silk, so it snags real easy. But it came out absolutely gorgeous."

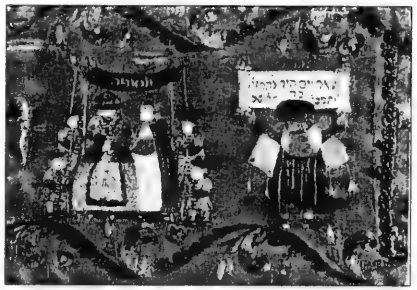
For Klein, one of the most spiritually rewarding aspects of the chupah was the connection it provided her with her grandmother.

Klein's grandmother died a few months prior to the wedding and only three days before she was set to meet Weinstein.

"I needed something to kind of invite her into the ceremony a symbolic way to connect with her," Klein said. "She was a seamstress who used to sew pants and clothes for me.

"So even though making the chupah was an incredibly intense and exhausting experience, I could real feel her presence. Her soul was there, and I felt it. It was very powerful."

Like Klein, another bride who got married at the Brazil Room in Berkeley's Tilden Park was able to feel a connection to her deceased grandmother through a homemade chupah.



A traditional chupah circa 1750.

Employing a somewhat popular make-your-own technique, Debbie Weinstein and David Paulson asked about 60 relatives and friends to decorate 9-inch by 9-inch pieces of cloth.

Forty squares were returned, which the Oakland couple fashioned into a quilt-like chupah that now hangs in their bedroom.

"My mom's square had a handkerchief from my [late] grandma," Weinstein said. "It helped me feel like her spirit was there."

Paulson and Weinstein, who wed in November 1998, were extremely impressed by the creativity of their family and friends.

Some people transferred photos to their piece of fabric. One person incorporated the footprints of her baby in her design. Another used a Japanese symbol to represent happiness and good luck in marriage.

"We wanted our chupah to represent the home we shared," Weinstein said. "We also wanted it to represent family and friends, and we wanted the ones who weren't able to come to the wedding to be spiritually there through their square."

Fourteen months after their wedding, Paulson and Weinstein are happy they took the suggestion of Jerry Derblich, the owner of Afikomen in Berkeley, to create their own chupah.

"It's so great having this permanent gift from all of our friends and family," Weinstein said.

Pam Brown of San Francisco feels the same way. "I'm so glad we made our own rather than just buying a piece of lace or something," she said.

"I got a lot more satisfaction out of doing what we did."

What she and her husband, Ron Lippert, did for their June 1998 ceremony near Muir Woods in Marin County was create a chupah that showed off several of their favourite things.

Using fabric paint, they reproduced onto a 7-foot by 7-foot piece of muslin the following items: a manatee, a whale, a big piece of chocolate and a crimson rose as a tribute to Lippert's late mother, whose name was Rose.

"We chose our colours first, mostly blues and some lavender, and then started picking our symbols," said Brown, who is Catholic.

"Since we're an interfaith couple, we didn't really discuss putting any religious symbols on there. We went for the more personal symbols."

Brown, who did most of the work, said the process was therapeutic.

"It was my way of de-stressing before the wedding — on my hands and knees in the garage with all this colour around me. It was a real fun thing to do."

And as for the piece of chocolate, that requires little explanation. "We are chocolate nuts," she said. "Everybody got a kick out of that."

U of T's Jewish students to get a new home

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Jewish Campus Services of Greater Toronto (JCS) held its annual campus awards ceremony recently at the University of Toronto, but the greatest hoopla was reserved for the pre-awards groundbreaking at the site of the future Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life.

It was a groundbreaking occasion both literally and figuratively, said Leslie Gales, referring to the inaugural event of Jewish Toronto Tomorrow (JTT), an initiative of UJA FEDERATION of Greater Toronto, following the project's April launch.

Gales, a co-chair of JTT, was speaking under a tent in back of the property at the northwest corner of Huron Street and Harbord Avenue, before donning a hard hat and taking in hand a gold-painted shovel as one of the ground-breakers.

The new facility, a joint project of JCS and JTT, is expected to be completed in 12 to 18 months.

Zac Kaye, the driving force behind the creation of the centre since he was hired five years ago to head Jewish Campus Services, said the project demonstrates "a recognition by the university and the Jewish community that the work Jewish Campus Services does is vital. We provide important educational, social and cultural opportunities."

The project has given the Wolfond family an opportunity to "ensure the continued vitality of our Jewish future by providing Jewish students with a place to call their own," said Greg Wolfond, who with his brothers Chad and Henry donated a $1 million in honor of their parents Mel (co-chair of the 1999 UJA FEDERATION campaign) and Pedie.

The families of Saul and Henry Koschitzky also gave a substantial donation of $250,000.

For the past few years, home base for the Jewish Students' Union at the University of Toronto, which has about 4,500 Jewish students, has been a rented space in the basement of University College.

The JSU has a 55-year history, dating back to the creation of the B'nai Brith Hillel Foundation shortly after World War II, said David Gotfrid, president of JCS. The organization was funded by B'nai Brith Canada and housed on St. George Street, where Gotfrid's parents met, he noted.

A second location on St. George was destroyed in a fire, as were archival materials.

When B'nai Brith Canada withdrew funding in 1990, the federation, which had provided some funding, "immediately jumped in," said Gotfrid. (B'nai Brith provided a house for JSU on Spadina Ave. until 1996.)

Gotfrid called Toronto's federation a "trend-setter," noting that the JSU's counterpart at York University, dating back to the early 1970s, may have been the first organization of its kind to be funded by a local federation. "Today this is the norm."

* * *

Campus awards were given to Jennifer Gold and Stacey Ordon of York University's Jewish Students' Federation, and to Harvey Cayne, Mark Sinyor, Keren Fryman, Linor Gerchak and Elana Weintraub of JSU.

Citywide awards were presented to:

- Ora Zobin (the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto Action Committee for Jewish Continuity Award for Enhancing Jewish Identity and Continuity);
- Lesley Garelick (the Jacobovici Family Award for Arts and Culture);
- Ellie Richmond (the Canadian Jewish News Award for Communication);
- Jeremy Zacks (the Gropper Family Award for Outstanding Leadership);
- Josefa Michaelson (the Paisley Manor Insurance Brokers Inc. Award for Special Involvement in Jewish Campus Life);
- Lawrence Janit (the Gottesman Family Award for Strengthening Koach, the Conservative Movement on Campus);
- Samantha Purwitsky and Aviva Pelt (the Nechama and Ya'akov Kaner Award for Creative Programming);
- Graduate and Professionals program (the UJA FEDERATION of Greater Toronto Award for Chesed and Social Justice); and
- Rhoda Dinardo (the Jewish Campus Services Award for Ongoing Commitment to Jewish Student Life).

The Canadian Jewish News received a Founding Friend of the Campus Award. Excerpts from editor Mordechai Ben-Dat's speech can be found in last week's From the editor's desk.

Changes in JCS staff were also announced. Lance Davis, former director of education at JCS, will be working for UIA Federations Canada; Tamar Kagan is relinquishing her role as arts and culture co-ordinator, but will still be involved in staff training and student leadership development; and Tamara Kochberg of Koach is leaving to pursue educational opportunities in Israel.

Diet is a four letter word, says registered dietitian

By SIMONE JOSEPH
Special To the CJN

TORONTO — We are constantly bombarded by two opposing forces: the pressure to eat more and the pressure not to eat, says registered dietitian Sharon Gottlieb.

Gottlieb, director of nutrition at the Fitness Institute, spoke about her book Seeing the Light: Eat Well, Be Active, Feel Good About Yourself, Once and For All (Nutrition Institute) at a recent Toronto Hadassah-WIZO presentation.

She began her talk by discussing a popular trend in food advertising – promoting mammoth, mega everything, like biggie fries and massive soft drinks. Gottlieb showed slides of advertisements with slogans like "big food for big value." In contrast to these ads, she showed media images of the "ideal women": rake-thin Jennifer Aniston (Rachel Green on the popular TV sitcom Friends), toothpick-sized Calista Flockhart (star of the show Ally McBeal) and other lightweight celebrities.

Then, she displayed a slide that was a classic example of a mixed message – it was a Good Housekeeping magazine cover from November 1999. The cover read "Ready, Set, Crash Diet."

A few lines down, it read, "New Classics For Thanksgiving" which invited the reader to look at the recipes inside.

Sharon Gottlieb

Gottlieb is an ex-dieter. She began dieting when she was about 10 years old and now calls "diet" a four-letter word. Instead of dieting, she advocates healthy eating. Think green, red and orange, she says. Eat salads with light dressings and fruit salads.

Gottlieb adheres to the "drink eight glasses of water" rule. In her book, she writes that drinking water is a must to replace the water we are constantly losing in our perspiration, breathing and elimination of waste from the body.

Water is filling and has zero calories and fat. If you are not used to drinking eight glasses of water daily, start with a few cups and gradually build up to eight, she advises.

Gottlieb warns people to beware of what she calls "multiples" – anything that is sold in a bag or a box like cookies or crackers or is served in a bowl like chips or nuts.

When eating multiples, it is difficult to just eat one, she says. Once the hand to mouth motion starts, it is near impossible to stop, she says. The solution? Go for a walk after dinner to avoid snacking or have a mini-meal instead of a snack.

She also warns against having too many carbohydrates. In her book, she explains that starchy foods like bread, pasta and potatoes used to be considered fattening. When national food guides began emphasizing grains, vegetables and fruits, people began including starchy foods in their diets.

"Before long, the bagel became king. Pasta ruled supreme," she writes.

Recently, people have begun questioning the place of starchy foods in a healthy diet. While many people think starchy foods are low in fat "they can pack a real calorie-laden punch, especially when consumed in typical North American serving-size portions," she writes. If you are eating too many starchy foods, substitute vegetables and fruits for some of the starch.

Choose whole grains over white flour, she says.

During the talk, Gottlieb addressed concern that when barbecuing, meat fat may drip onto wood, charcoal or gas flames and form potentially cancer-causing chemicals. Her suggestions to prevent this include: choosing meat which is well-trimmed of fat, removing skin, avoid placing meat directly over coals and pre-cook meat in the microwave or oven to reduce barbecuing time.

During the question-and-answer period, I tested her approach to healthy eating with a question from my life: What can you do if you're a chocoholic? Her answer: Try having light hot chocolate or a light chocolate popsicle or have one delicious chocolate and enjoy it.

Deaf-Blind Awareness Month

TORONTO — What would you do if you could only use your eyes and ears for three hours a week?

While this is an incomprehensible question for most people, it is a stark reality for the many people who are deaf-blind and living in our community.

Deaf-blindness is a unique disability that incorporates the dual sensory loss of both vision and hearing. Persons with this disability experience extreme isolation and the inability to access information.

June 2000 has been designated Deaf-Blind Awareness Month and the theme for this year is "You can make a difference."

June is also the month in which Rotary Cheshire Homes, a unique non-profit housing project in Toronto especially designed for people who are deaf-blind, celebrates its anniversary.

Court lifts ban on women's Torah service at the Wall

By VIVA PRESS
CJN Israel Bureau

JERUSALEM — The High Court of Justice, in a groundbreaking decision, has ruled that women may read aloud from the Torah at the Western Wall.

Justices Tova Strasberg-Cohen, Dorit Beinisch and Eliahu Mazza ruled on May 22 that women wearing tallitot and praying from the Torah could conduct a service at the Wall.

Before the ruling, a woman could face a six-month jail sentence for violating the ban.

Shas Minister Yitzhak Cohen vowed to submit legislation to override the court ruling.

Meretz MK Naomi Chazan said the ruling finally established that the Western Wall does not belong to the Orthodox, but to the Jewish people, including women.

Anat Hoffman, who had appealed on behalf of the organization Women of the Wall, called the ruling a turning point.

"I was ashamed that I lived in a city and belonged to a religion where a woman who prays there could be imprisoned for half a year," Hoffman told Israel Radio. "Today that stain has been removed."

Yitzhak Cohen

Rabbi Paul Golomb, executive director of the Canadian Council for Reform Judaism in Toronto, said that although he is pleased about the decision, it is important to remember that the Wall is not a synagogue. "This is not a battle about praying in a synagogue, and whether there should be a division or not. This is a different type of battle.

"It is not a Reform issue. Women of the Wall include women from Orthodox, Conservative and Reform movements. There has been no attempt to conduct a service within specific Reform Jewish liturgy," Rabbi Golomb said.

Earlier attempts by women to conduct services at the Wall have prompted violent protests by Haredim.

The Women of the Wall first petitioned the High Court in 1989 after enduring violent attacks meant to stop them from conducting their public prayer service. The women asked the court to order the government to recognize their right to pray at the Western Wall as they wished.

Shas vows countermanding legislation

The panel of three justices who heard the first petition was divided. Justice Shlomo Levin ruled that the women should be allowed to pray at the Wall. Justice Menahem Elon ruled that the women should be barred from praying at the Wall. Justice Meir Shamgar wrote that while women were entitled to pray at the Wall, the government should find a solution that took into account both the women's right to pray at the Wall and the sensibilities of other worshippers who felt some aspects of the women's service violated Jewish tradition. He also suggested that the women should not necessarily pray at Judaism's holiest site, but perhaps nearby.

An attempt was made to comply with Shamgar's ruling. On May 17, 1994, the government appointed a committee to find a solution in accordance with his recommendation. It gave the committee six months to come up with a solution.

The committee asked the chief rabbis for their opinion. The rabbis ruled that the women's service violated Jewish tradition and should not be permitted. The police told the committee that the presence of the women conducting services at the Western Wall would be perceived as a provocation and result in public disturbances.

On April 2, 1996, the committee determined that "the Western Wall prayer area is extremely problematic," and suggested alternative sites outside the main prayer area, including an exposed part of the Western Wall inside the Muslim Quarter and Robinson's Arch.

Meantime, on May 30, 1995, the Women of the Wall had petitioned the High Court again, after the government had extended the committee's deadline for a second time.

The verdict handed down last week was in response to this petition. In this ruling, Justice Eliahu Mazza wrote that in 1994, the High Court had recognized the right of the group to pray at the Wall and that subsequent government suggestions had failed because they involved moving the group away from the Wall.

"The clear position which emerges from a study of the statements of Shamgar and Levin – and it should be noted that I essentially agree with this position – is that the women have the right to pray according to their custom in the open space in front of the Western Wall," he wrote.

He admitted there was no way of finding a solution that allowed the women the right to pray at the Wall without hurting the sensibilities of those opposed to such a service.

"We're delighted by the ruling... It promotes religious pluralism," Rabbi Joel Osseran, director of education for the World Union for Progressive Judaism, told The CJN.

Rabbi Osseran noted that the Women of the Wall organization has issues different from those of the Progressive Judaism group for which he works, but reiterated that the ruling on their behalf is "a progressive step forward."

Rabbi Osseran said that while his organization is pleased with the decision, they are cautious about the petitions filed against the ruling. "We hope the petitions won't succeed," he said.

United Torah Judaism MK Moshe Gafni said the public would not respect the decision.

Minister Michael Melchior, responsible for Diaspora and social affairs, said the ruling was a mistake. "We can't solve the central problems in the society by forcing the hand of one side or another," he told the Jerusalem Post.

But the justices said there was no reason to deny women the right to pray at the Wall. The Court told the government to make arrangements within six months that would allow women to read safely from the Torah in the women's section. They also awarded the Women of the Wall group NIS 10,000 for their legal fees.

Israel offers compensation to bridge victims

CJN News Services

Nearly three years after the bridge disaster of the 15th Maccabiah Games claimed four lives and injured 60 others, the government of Israel is attempting to hasten the resolution of outstanding compensation issues.

Last week, Finance Minister Avraham Shochat approved the transfer of $500,000 (US) in loan funds to the Australian victims. The government set up a fund of the same amount following the 1997 disaster but it was exhausted last fall. Shochat announced the second fund following a meeting with Australia Maccabi president Tom Danos.

Shochat promised to expedite payments in nine civil suits in which compensation amounts have been agreed. He said the state will pay its one-third share immediately, regardless of other defendants' payment arrangements. The government had initially made its payment contingent on payment of the other two-thirds.

In other developments, minister for Diaspora affairs Michael Melchior heeded the call of Australian Jews and did not attend the recent Maccabi World Union (MWU) annual congress, where he was scheduled to speak. Melchior told the MWU he would attend only if MWU president Ronald Bakalarz resigned or announced his intention to do so.

The Australian Jewish community has called on Bakalarz and MWU chair Uzi Netanel to take responsibility for the disaster and resign. For years they had steadfastly refused. That position was backed by Maccabi Canada president Roy Salomon, who is also a member of the MWU executive.

About one month ago, Netanel resigned in the wake of a decision by the Tel Aviv Magistrate Court that found five persons, including Yoram Eyal, head of MWU's organizing committee at the Games, guilty of negligence. Bakalarz, however, refused to resign.

Bakalarz's refusal to resign prompted an angry response from Isi Leibler, chair of the governing body of the World Jewish Congress and a former president of the Executive Council of Australian Jewry.

Bakalarz's refusal to resign "is outrageous and arrogant in the extreme," Leibler wrote in the Jerusalem Post.

In addition to withdrawing from the Maccabiah Games, Maccabi Australia suspended itself last week from the MWU.

In other developments, Canadian Jewish Congress called on the Israeli Ministry of Justice to "work swiftly to achieve a generous and compassionate settlement in this terrible situation... There is a compelling need for just and equitable compensation to the victims and their families," wrote Congress president Moshe Ronen.

Congress also urged the MWU to co-operate fully in a Knesset inquiry into the disaster and to "launch a review of safety and operational procedure for future games.

New charges revive fears of execution

By MICHAEL J. JORDAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency and CJN News Services

The ongoing trial of 13 Iranian Jews charged with spying for Israel took an ominous turn last week when four of the defendants were reportedly also accused of spying for Iraq.

The circumstances of the new accusations against the four, all prominent religious figures in the Jewish community, are unclear. The allegations relate to the war between Iraq and Iran during the 1980s and were brought to light in the French news agency, Agence France-Presse by two French human rights lawyers.

The two lawyers have been the only foreigners permitted access – albeit restricted access – to the court.

An Iranian judiciary official dismissed the new claims as "baseless," and an Iraqi official speaking from Baghdad described the reported accusations as "stupid."

The confusion over what was said only underscores how suspect Iran's handling of the case against the 13 Iranian Jews has been.

In another worrisome development, the Associated Press reported last week that several Jewish merchants have had their businesses attacked since last month's opening of the trial.

Jewish leaders and members of Iran's 25,000-strong Jewish community say they have become more isolated since the "confessions" of two of the accused were shown on state television.

Community leaders say classmates are treating Jewish children with contempt at school, and fear or shame has kept some Jews from going to work.

"This trial has created problems for the whole Jewish community in Iran," said Haroun Yashayaii, head of Iran's Jewish society, outside the courthouse, as proceedings resumed last week in the southern Iranian city of Shiraz.

"I have documents showing that several shops owned by Jews were attacked and one was set on fire in Tehran."

He said police have confirmed the arson attack, but gave no other details.

"It's clear that different Iranian officials tell different things to different people," said Pooya Dayanim, a spokesperson for the Los Angeles-based Council of Iranian American Jewish Organizations.

Further developments in the case came as the last three of the "Iran 13" proclaimed their innocence in court last week.

They are a student, Navid Balazadeh, 17; his uncle, Nejat Broukhim, 36; and Omid Tefileen, 26, whose older brother, Hamid "Dani" Tefileen, was the first to publicly "confess" to spying.

The rumour of the new charges has renewed fears that some of the Jews may face execution, a fear Iranian judiciary officials tried to dispel last week.

If the new rumour is true, "it's disturbing because it shows the Iranians are willing to charge them with anything," Dayanim said.

"It's a sign from Iran that they could still get the death penalty because they were committing espionage at a time of war. It also shows that the fate of the Jews is completely in their hands, changing from day to day on a whim."

A verdict was expected by the end of May.

The Week in Israel

May 22

• Israeli-Palestinian negotiations in Sweden, which were delayed because of violence in the West Bank, will resume shortly, a top Israeli official at the talks said. Public security minister Shlomo Ben-Ami said the differences between the two sides remain substantial.

May 23

• The UN Security council endorsed a plan to verify Israel's withdrawal from south Lebanon. The plan was based on recommendations from Secretary General Kofi Annan.

May 24

• Israel completed the removal of its troops from south Lebanon, ending a 22-year military presence there. No soldiers were hurt in the withdrawal. More than 5,000 SLA soldiers and their families were granted asylum in Israel.

May 25

• Speaking at a special session of the Knesset in Kiryat Shmonah, Prime Minister Ehud Barak called on the president of Lebanon to make peace.

• The Knesset passed a resolution calling on U.S. President Bill Clinton to grant amnesty to Jonathan Pollard.

May 26

• The attorney general recommended that transportation minister Yitzhak Mordechai stand trial for sexually assaulting three women in the past eight years. Mordechai could face up to seven years in prison.

'Israel is at a new crossroads'

IDF Leaves Lebanon –COMMENT–

By ZE'EV SCHIFF
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Senior IDF officers have been asked if they feel a sense of defeat in the forced rapid withdrawal from south Lebanon. All except one reported a feeling of failure.This is understandable, but not really justified.

In the past, the IDF was forced to withdraw

when the Egyptian army overran the Bar-Lev line in 1973, but later in Sinai, the tables were turned.

In Lebanon, the sense of failure comes from the fact that the IDF was unable to suppress a guerrilla organization and from the fact that the Israeli public's threshold for absorbing casualties has been lowered. It has taken some time for the IDF to properly comprehend this.

From a military perspective, the last stage of the withdrawal was commendable – the IDF did not retreat under fire as Hezbollah had promised. Northern Command and Maj.-Gen. Gaby Ashkenazy deserve credit for overseeing a withdrawal with no losses, despite the difficulties caused by the collapse of the South Lebanon Army.

In the IDF, they feel ashamed – and rightly so – of the shabby treatment accorded the SLA, whose soldiers paid the price in hundreds of casualties for standing alongside the IDF in the fight against Hezbollah.

In the Prime Minister's Office, the cynical view suggests it's good that things turned out the way they did. From a political standpoint, Barak has notched a victory in gaining international legitimacy (from some Arabs too) for his withdrawal from Lebanon. For the first time, an IDF operation has actually won UN support.

Hezbollah's notable success during the withdrawal phase derived from its clever use of the Lebanese citizens who streamed back into the southern villages, for they are the ones who brought about the collapse of the SLA.

The IDF was paralyzed because it did not want to shoot at civilians. Hezbollah learned from the Palestinian intifadah – perhaps now the Palestinians will take a leaf from Hezbollah's book.

We ought to ask ourselves what would happen if now tens of thousands of Palestinians were to start marching from the refugee camps in Lebanon toward the border. Would we open fire?

In the Palestinian Authority, they have also planned for the possibility of having unarmed Palestinian policemen enter Abu Dis and other neighbourhoods near Jerusalem. Would we start shooting in such a situation?

Israel finds itself at new crossroads here, and it must grasp the plain fact that there are limits to military power. The country is now approaching the final stage of a process in which its self-defence will be conducted entirely from within its borders, without occupying or holding territory in neighbouring countries. This week, we freed ourselves of the last piece of occupied Lebanese territory.

Now there is some uncertainty as to how things will develop. It's doubtful that Syrian President Hafez al-Assad already has decided how to proceed from the new situation. One possibility is that he will continue, one way or another, to support terrorist action against Israel from Lebanon.

This would lead to military confrontation with the Syrians, first in Lebanon, and then possibly in the Golan as well. Assad is aware of the risks – including the risk to his son's inheritance. Israel's deterrent capability against Syria remains unchanged in spite of everything – as long as we know how to wield it properly.

The other possibility is that the situation will now calm down and Assad will decide to renew his negotiations with Israel. The Syrian president understands that following the withdrawal from Lebanon, the Israeli public will not feel much pressure to cede the Golan, much less the shoreline and water of the Kinneret. He also realizes that pressure to remove his own army from Lebanon will increase.

Barak took a big gamble in Lebanon. He will reap success only if the border stays quiet and the chance of negotiations with Syria is revived. But if the northern border sees new eruptions despite the withdrawal and if we slide into military confrontation with Syria, the wager will be lost.

Timeline of Israel's presence in Lebanon

April 1975: Beginning of the civil war in Lebanon.

1976: Israel and Christian militias hold their first contacts, aimed at developing an alliance against their common enemy, the PLO.

March 1978: Israel launches Operation Litani, taking control of Lebanese territory south of the Litani River in an effort to curb cross-border attacks by Palestinian guerrillas. Within days, the UN Security Council passes two resolutions on Lebanon: Resolution 425 calls on Israel to withdraw from all Lebanese territory; Resolution 426 establishes the United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon, a peacekeeping force that has remained in place until today.

July 1981: Israeli forces bomb PLO headquarters in West Beirut.

June 1982: Israel launches Operation Peace for Galilee, the start of its full-scale invasion of Lebanon, eventually driving the PLO out of the country.

September 1982: Christian Phalangists massacre hundreds of Palestinians in the Sabra and Shatila refugee camps.

1985: Israel creates a nine-mile-wide security zone after withdrawing most of its troops from Lebanon.

November 1989: Ta'if Agreement brings the civil war in Lebanon to an end. Brokered by the Arab League, it endorses a Syrian military presence in Lebanon.

July 1993: Following the killing of seven Israeli soldiers in southern Lebanon, Israel launches Operation Accountability, during which the IDF carries out its heaviest artillery and air attacks on southern Lebanon since 1982.

April 1996: Israel launches Operation Grapes of Wrath, striking at targets in Lebanon to retaliate for Hezbollah rocket attacks on northern Israel. After shelling of the Kana UN camp in southern Lebanon results in the deaths of at least 91 Lebanese refugees who had taken shelter there, Israel suffers heavy international criticism and ends the operation.

September 1997: Twelve Israeli naval commandos are killed during a raid on Lebanon. It is the IDF's heaviest casualty count in a single military operation in more than 12 years.

November 1997: Dozens of Israeli soldiers are killed in a crash of two helicopters en route from Lebanon. The accident prompts growing demands for an end to Israel's military presence in Lebanon.

March 1999: Opposition leader Ehud Barak pledges during Israel's election campaign that if elected prime minister, he will get all Israeli troops out of Lebanon by June 2000.

March 2000: Israel's Cabinet votes unanimously for a full troop withdrawal.

Backweb Technologies

Ex-paratrooper leads e-commerce company

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

In Backweb Technologies' promotional materials, Eli Barkat's service in the Israeli military is prominently detailed. Likewise on the company's Web site (www.backweb.com), it's there for all to see. Barkat, we are told, served as a lieutenant in an elite Israeli paratroops unit.

All well and good, but what does that have to do with running a company that operates on the cutting edge of e-commerce? Plenty, says Barkat, Backweb's 37-year-old founder and CEO.

"In battle, time to market is everything," he explained. "You're forced to make decisions in one to three seconds. If people think the Internet is fast, it's a joke compared to a real battle decision. In the IDF, you're trained to make instinctive decisions that are very powerful. You get trained to have no ego, to be a leader, to do something for a cause, to get a group of people to believe in a cause and to fight for it."

Those skills translate perfectly in the high-tech world where, "fast decisions are better than correct decisions... If you look at today's era, time to market is more important than distribution. Money [is] more important than anything. It's all about speed to critical mass," he said.

Backweb, Barkat's baby, is three years old and like many Internet companies, it's shown some impressive growth, up 150 percent in the first quarter of 2000 over the same period last year. It went public on NASDAQ in June and it has traded between $12 and $59.12 (all figures U.S.). It's currently trading around $19 and in its last quarterly financial statement, it reported a loss of $0.06 a share.

With a market capitalization of $689 million, Backweb boasts an impressive client roster that includes Bell Atlantic Mobile, Cisco Systems, Charles Schwab & Co., Compaq, Goldman Sachs & Co., Hewlett-Packard, Nortel Networks and SBC Communications.

Its corporate headquarters are in Ramat Gan and San Jose, Calif., but Backweb also has an important Canadian connection. The development of its new technologies is done right here in Toronto and the company has emerged as a major player in the world of "push technology" and of "Polite(TM) push technology," its bandwidth-friendly offshoot.

Push technology brings information to a client's desktop without the need to actively search for it. Polite push adds to that convenience by bringing it over the Internet in a way that takes advantage of lulls in network activity.

Barkat describes push technology this way. Once, people went to a well for water and brought it home in a bucket. That's old technology. Today, pipes bring water into peoples' homes. That's push technology.

"Push does the same with the Web," he said. Instead of a user going to a Web site for information, "a user-centric model is created where a user subscribes to areas of interest and the information comes to him. This eliminates friction."

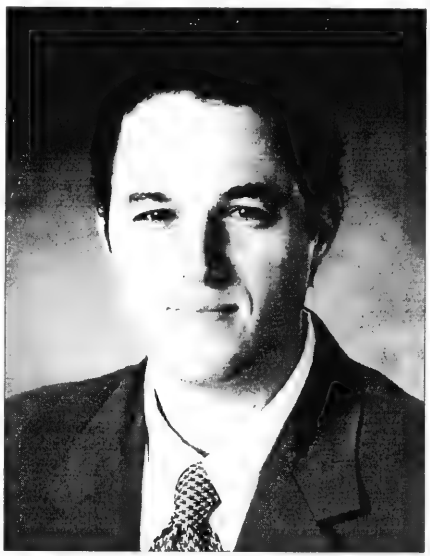
Toronto office develops new technologies

Barkat points to a computer jukebox as an example. Once a user has installed polite push, subscribed to a music service and filled out a form describing his or her tastes, the system will upload music to their electronic jukebox at a time when network traffic is low.

One of Backweb's products, the Sales Accelerator, was designed in Toronto and is geared specifically for sales and marketing executives, including resellers and distributors.

Backweb's business is geared primarily to the "intranet side," the business to business back office connections that are improving productivity and reducing costs in numerous companies.

So far, most of Backweb's revenue is generated through royalty fees and transaction fees. By next year, Barkat expects to increase revenue from transaction fees and he expects double digit growth in that area – despite the recent volatility in capital markets.



Eli Barkat

For Barkat, things have moved quickly since he, his brother and three partners founded BRM – their first high-tech company – in Israel 14 years ago. The success of BRM's anti-virus product led Barkat to search for other new technology.

Eventually he and two of his BRM partners, Lior Hass and Iftak Sneh, founded Backweb and placed their bets on polite push. Barkat, a former software engineer, is convinced that the future of the Internet will move from a "passive portal" to an "active portal where recipients and end users are in control of what is delivered to them."

Backweb is only one of dozens of high-tech players on the Israeli scene.

In fact, Israel is a world leader in high-tech and Barkat attributes that in large part to the IDF. At 18, he points out, the IDF drafts all Israeli youngsters and streams the most talented into elite military or intelligence units.

Their training prepares them perfectly for a management position in a high-tech company. The area around Ramat Gan "is quickly becoming the Silicon Valley of Europe. There's the right amount of entrepreneurship there, awesome amounts of talent and a huge amount of innovation," he said.

Barkat revels in the fast-paced action and challenges of the e-com world. He's admittedly "hyperactive" and needs the positive stress from being in a dynamic environment.

For him, e-commerce and the Internet are perfect fits for his personality and skills.

The Israeli government has established some good programs for start-ups but there are still plenty of roadblocks to success in the Holy Land, he said. Merger and acquisition limitations, shareholder regulations, the difficulty in issuing stock options to employees and countless other details make running a company in Israel very difficult. In addition, Israel's security exchange "can drive you crazy," he said.

These factors, combined with Israel's small domestic market, lead companies to look abroad for growth. The U.S. market has become a prime area for expansion and, ironically, 90 percent of Israeli startups are in the United States, Barkat said.

"To create a business in Israel you have to be a real big Zionist or a real stupid businessman. I'm a Zionist, so I stay there."

TORONTO — "Somebody just dropped out of the cast – I've set up an audition for you, get your tuchas to Toronto tomorrow!"

This is the call that New York based actor, singer and dancer, Howard Kaye, got from his friend Edward G. Robinson, musical director for Mamma Mia!, a production based on the songs of '70s group ABBA now playing at The Royal Alexandra Theatre.

He got the gig! Kaye, 37, quit his job as dance captain and swing performer on Broadway in Miss Saigon and relocated to Toronto with his baby Sophia, a 10-pound chihuahua in toe.

Kaye landed the role of the priest in Mamma Mia! "It is the first time in my career, I've played a priest," said the brother-in-law of a rabbi.

Mamma Mia, a London stage hit last year, interweaves 22 Abba songs, including Dancing Queen and Money, Money, Money, into a humorous story, set in the present, of a mother and soon-to-be-wed daughter on a tiny Greek island.

Catherine Johnson created a story around the music and lyrics written 25 years ago by Benny Andersson and Björn Ulvaeus.

"It is groundbreaking to take music from one idiom and apply it to the theatre," explained Kaye. "They didn't even change any of the lyrics. It will catch you off guard when you remember these songs from another time and place and now hear them in a whole new way."

The Ohio born and raised performer broke into show business at the ripe old age of 12 playing John Darling in the touring company of Peter Pan, starring Sandy Dennis.

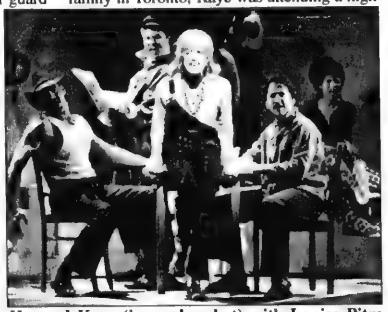
Ironically, a recent reunion with Dennis was the inspiration for Kaye to take a leap of faith and leave one theatre for another.

"I had a ticket for Sandy Duncan's last performance of Chicago on Broadway. It was important to me to see her again. In the hoopla of her closing, I did get to meet her after the show. I brought with me, the opening night gift she gave me 25 years ago.

"It was an engraved thimble on a chain which read – To HK, Love Sandy. She was mildly blown away. I asked her if she wouldn't mind giving it a squeeze, so I could have another 25 years of her good theatre magic and love.

"She took my hand and we gripped this thimble together. The next day Eddie called."

As a youngster when he wasn't visiting family in Toronto, Kaye was attending a high school for the performing arts in Cincinnati, where he was encouraged to learn to sing and dance as well as act.



Howard Kaye (in cowboy hat) with Louise Pitre and the Mamma Mia ensemble.

"I moved [to New York] in 1985 and attended Julliard. When you graduate from Julliard, you've got a degree from the most fantastic acting school in the world, but you've got no work. So, you start the endless hunt of auditions."

The thespian's driving ambition paid off. He won roles in the off-Broadway production The Little Prince, toured Europe in Jesus Christ Superstar and appeared on American stages in The Wizard of Oz, Oklahoma!, Tin Types and The Rocky Horror Picture Show.

His big break came with Broadway's Miss Saigon in 1995 where he first worked with Robinson.

"I didn't have a performing job, so I took a job bartending … and was assigned the Broadway theatre where Miss Saigon plays," Kaye said.

"I would show up and pour drinks, eventually I got an audition and got a job as a swing, performing different parts.

"Within a year, I became dance captain. I think it was more meaningful to me than any other cast member to be able to enter the theatre through the stage door."

Mamma Mia! is at The Royal Alexandra Theatre for a limited run before heading to San Francisco and eventually Broadway. For tickets call TicketKing 416-872-1212 or 1-800-461-3333.

Voices of Change highlights rights of minorities to kids

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The rights of minorities in the cultural mix of Canada is the theme of Voices of Change.

The production will be presented to students in grades 5 to 8 by Inner Stage Theatre at Leah Posluns Theatre, June 6 at 1 p.m.

Jewish producer, director and co-author Elizabeth Szathmary, a professional dancer and actor, is enthusiastic about the three languages in the play – Cree, French and English, and the three students – a native Canadian, a Québécoise and a Caucasian.

Of Hungarian descent, born in New York, Szathmary told The CJN it is important for Canadians of different backgrounds to be sensitive to the needs of others through the way they communicate.

"The dialogue is based on the rhythm of the body emotions," she said.

The actors portray students age 14 and 15. Ryan McMahon of Fort Frances is part Ojibwa. He was discovered at the Centre for Indigenous Theatre and plays the native Canadian. Jennifer Gautier plays the Québécoise and Sean Clement is the Caucasian. The teacher is acted by Michael Posthumus.

The Inner Stage producer has been through a trying time recently as the theatre's office and records were destroyed in a fire on St. Nicholas Street. The company has relocated to Harbour Square.

A resident of Toronto since 1967, Szathmary was co-founder of the Global Village Theatre, which produced several hits including Justine, starring Salome Bey, during the theatre's existence from 1969 to 1975.

The project occupying her just now is with the Amati Quartet's production of Music, Mask and Emotion, a classical music piece in which she portrays the dancer. Now being tried out at various schools, it will be performed at the Mississauga Children's Festival June 8 and 9.

Composer Remembered: The Guelph Spring Festival pays tribute to Louis Applebaum, the great Canadian composer who died in April after a lengthy illness. Applebaum served as artistic director of the festival in 1989.

Born in Toronto in 1918, Applebaum wrote more than 250 film scores and composed works to accompany more than 50 plays at the Stratford Festival. He served as executive director of the Ontario Arts Council in the 1970s. He was a member of the Order of Canada and the Order of Ontario, and had honorary degrees from York University and the University of Windsor.

A music critic once said that Louis Applebaum had "the pedigree of an artist, the wardrobe of a businessman, and the mind of a rabbi."

The Festival Strings of Canada performs a memorial concert to Applebaum, featuring his composition Notions, a duet for violin and piano. June 3, 8 p.m. $24-$21. River Run Centre, Guelph. 519-763-3000.

Rosenfarb to read at Book Awards

By ADAM FUERSTENBERG
Special to the CJN

TORONTO — Chava Rosenfarb, one of the greats of modern Yiddish literature, will be the reader at this year's festive annual Jewish Book Awards. The occasion will mark Syracuse University Press' launch of English translations of two of Rosenfarb's most celebrated novels.

The book awards will be held 7:30 p.m. on June 7 at the Leah Posluns Theatre. Rosenfarb and this year's prize winners will have their works available for sale and autographing.

To Yiddish readers around the world, Rosenfarb is renowned as a great Yiddish writer who survived the Holocaust to bear witness to the indescribable horror of the ghettos and death camps. Born in Lodz in 1923, she first drew attention as a poet after the war, but she is also known as a playwright.

Her drama, A Fojgl In Ghetto, the heroic story of Itzik Wittenberg's voluntary martyrdom in the Vilna Ghetto, was performed in Yiddish at the Habima Theatre in Israel in 1959. However, she is best known for her darkly magnificent fiction, especially her magnum opus Der Borjm Fun Lebn (The Tree of Life), the three volume epic story of life in Lodz before World War II and during the ghetto years under the Nazis.

Even though Rosenfarb was awarded the J.I. Segal Prize, her work has been largely inaccessible to English readers until recently.

Now she has found an effective helper in her efforts to translate her work, her daughter, Goldie Morgentaler, who is her child by her first husband, Dr. Henry Morgentaler, also a survivor of the Lodz ghetto and the death camps.

Goldie Morgentaler, a PhD in English who is a professor at the University of Lethbridge in Alberta, helped her mother translate and shorten The Tree of Life into a single volume. The English edition, though still a massive 1,000 pages, was published by Scribe, an Australian publishing house, in 1985. Now Syracuse University Press has published translations of two of Chava Rosenfarb's best-known novels, Bociany and Of Love and Lodz, which is a significant recognition of her place in worldwide Jewish literature.

In the last few years, English readers have been able to read one of Rosenfarb's most powerful short stories, Edgia's Revenge, first published in the Yiddish journal Di Goldene Keyt. Morgentaler's translation appeared in the prize-winning anthology Found Treasures: Stories by Yiddish Women Writers.

Published by Second Story Press in Toronto, Found Treasures won the Jewish Book Committee's Prize for Yiddish translation in 1996. This anthology received widespread acclaim and circulation in the United States and undoubtedly led to the extensive coverage Rosenfarb received in the Summer 1997 issue of the National Yiddish Book Centre's very popular journal, the PaknTreger.

Adam Fuerstenberg, director of the committee for Yiddish, UJA Federation, is an adjunct professor of English at Ryerson Polytechnic University, chairperson of the Jewish Book Awards committee, and editor of Parchment.

Art of wooden shipbuilding comes to life in Mystic Seaport

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

CONNECTICUT — With great fanfare, and celebrities Ruby Dee and Ossie Davis on hand, Connecticut's Mystic Seaport launched its reproduction of the Freedom Schooner on March 25th.

This wooden masterpiece, which was depicted in Stephen Spielberg's film, The Amistad, took over two years to construct at the Mystic Seaport's Preservation Shipyard.

It is currently on display at the seaport until July 2 when it will make its maiden voyage with the Tall Ships Parade to OpSail 2000 in New York harbour on July 4, American Independence Day.

Thereafter, she will sail with hundreds of vessels to Connecticut's salute to the millennium, OpSail 2000 CT. The ship will dock from July 12 to 16 in New London, one of 33 towns and communities in the picturesque Mystic Places which comprises southeastern Connecticut and coastal Rhode Island.

In 1839, the original Amistad also found its way to New London, when 53 kidnapped Africans, bound for slavery, overtook the ship off the coast of Cuba and erratically travelled north before they were taken into custody in this coastal town.

In a landmark decision, the U.S. Supreme Court ruled that the slaves were free men.

Tourists to the Mystic Seaport and the Museum of America and the Sea, which was founded in 1929, will enjoy the recreated 19th-century village buildings, tall ships, exhibit galleries and a shipyard. Here, the art of wooden shipbuilding comes back to life.

The Argia, a replica of an 81-foot 19th-century schooner, offers morning, afternoon and evening sails to the public.

Brilliant, Mystic Seaport's own schooner, is available for multi-day and weekend educational adventures for the entire family.

Lovers of the sea should include the Mystic Aquarium in their itinerary. The aquarium is home to three beluga whales and a new $9 million Alaskan coast exhibit.

It is worth the drive to nearby Groton to check out the Historic Ship Nautilus/Submarine Force Museum.

Visitors are invited to climb aboard the first U.S. nuclear submarine and take a self-guided audio tour free of charge. This scenic New England destination, one day's drive from Toronto or Montreal offers year-round activities and attractions including the Mashantucket Pequot Museum & Research Center.

You could spend a day exploring this amazing, interactive environment where native history is portrayed and you feel as if you were transplanted back 400 years to a Pequot village surrounded by 51 life like figures.

The Mahantucket Pequot people now own the Foxwoods Resort Casino, which houses a state of the art casino, golf courses, three luxury hotels, big name entertainment in a host of venues, and much more.

The Mohegan peoples run another gambling casino. Even non-players are attracted to the Mohegan Sun in Uncasville, a beautiful entertainment complex designed in honour of the four seasons, which is important to Mohegan culture.

"Project Sunburst" slated to open in 2002 will include a 1,200 room luxury hotel tower.

Other places of interest include downtown Norwich, a historical industrial centre during the last century and the Robert Mills U.S. Custom House in New London. Still operating since 1833, the oldest operating federal custom house was where the original Amistad was docked for two years while in custody.

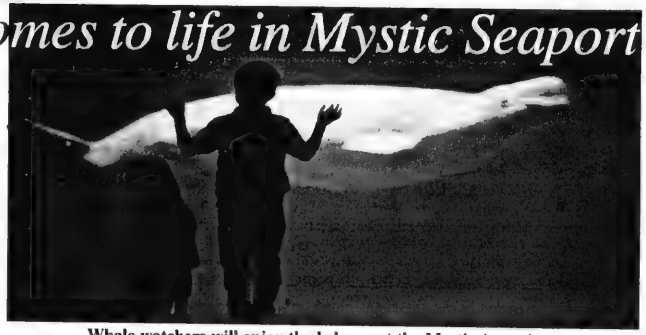
Of course, one of the main reasons tourists flock to Mystic Places is due to the beaches and there are plenty to choose from including the Misquamicut State Beach and the town beaches around Watch Hill, R.I., Ocean Beach Park, in New London and Harkness Memorial State Park in Waterford, Conn.

Tchatchke shopping is great all over Mystic Places. I could have spent hours poking around the 60 unique boutiques at the Olde Mistick Village, just off Interstate 95, the Crystal Mall or the quaint shops in downtown Mystic.

Accommodations are plentiful and offered at all price points from family-hotels and motels, pet friendly B&B's, large hotel properties, to the Foxwood Resort.

Randall's Ordinary, circa 1685, is far from ordinary. This country inn, located in North Stonington, is set on 250 acres where guests can view an underground chamber that served as a stop for slaves along the freedom trail.

Air Ontario offers a number of direct daily flights from Toronto to Hartford, Conn. and Providence, R.I., both one hour drives to Mystic Places.



Whale watchers will enjoy the belugas at the Mystic Aquarium.

How a grandfather shows love to grandson

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Many people who survived the horrors of the Holocaust don't like to talk about what happened. Sometimes it is because they get too upset remembering. Sometimes they don't want to upset their families.

The book Why, Zaida? by Alvin Abram, illustrated by Judy Willemsma, (AMAGraphics Inc., 2000) talks about that kind of person – a grandfather who talks about the Holocaust only after his grandson asks and asks.

"Trapped in my head are images of the past and I can't find the key to open the door," the grandfather thinks, when his grandson wants to know why there are no pictures of his grandfather's parents.

"I was his age when it all happened and I don't understand why I had to suffer such pain."

Nevertheless, the grandfather has to answer his grandson. He does this with the time-honoured technique of parables, stories that help teach a lesson – a robin eating a worm, a dog chasing a squirrel, a leaf caught in a stream, a grassy bank.

The words the grandfather chooses are gentle, yet unbearably sad. "Yes, lies hurt... but the truth can also hurt. One day, bad men came for my father and took him to a bad place. Then my mother understood the truth and gave me to a family to keep me safe. Later they came for my mother."

Every page has beautiful illustrations in lush greens, blues and browns.

Abram, who wrote Why, Zaida?, says he is not just writing about what happened to the Jews, but about love, the love a grandfather and grandson have for each other, the love people have for relatives even though they died a long time before.

What the grandfather seems to be saying is that people should stand up to those who try to hurt the weak and innocent.

Abram says he couldn't get a publisher to see that the book could be about anyone, not just Jews.

He is donating part of what he earns from selling the book to charity.

Teeny tiny gymnast wins provincial title

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — At 55 pounds, Samantha Katz is light enough to fly through the air like a feather in a warm gust of air, and flexible enough to practically bend in two. Some would say she has the ideal frame to develop into a champion gymnast.

Recently, the Thornhill youngster took a step along that road as she claimed first place overall in the Novice 1 category at the 2000 Ontario Provincial Youth Gymnastics Championships in Oakville.

Katz, 10, claimed the title with a first in beam, fifth in uneven bars, seventh in vault and eighth in floor exercises. She scored 33 out of a possible 36 points and eked out a razor-thin .1 point win over the second place finisher.

A fifth grade student at Westminster Public School, Samantha said she was "surprised to win, because there were a lot of kids...I'm pretty proud."

Her mom, Donna, is pretty proud too, considering the Oakville meet was Samantha's first ever competition at the provincial level. Last year, Samantha didn't even enter any pre-competition qualifying meets, but two years ago she won two regional events in East York and Oshawa.

Following the Ontario competition, Samantha qualified for a berth in the USAIGC national championships, a meet of independent gymnastics clubs, which will be held in Florida this June. Prior to that, Samantha will continue her tough training regimen at the Academy of Sports and Fitness (ASF), where she puts in about 25 hours a week, with only one day off.

"Samantha is a hard working kid. She's progressed tremendously in the last year," said ASF program co-ordinator Vicki Bialogrecki. "At her level, she's awesome."

Samantha currently competes at Level 1, an entry level for competitive gymnasts. Levels 2 and 3 feature progressively higher calibre gymnasts. Jennifer Horowitz, another ASF athlete, finished second in Junior 2 (12-year-olds) at the Ontario championships.

"Samantha I'm sure is working towards Level 2 next year. She's on her way up for sure," Bialogrecki said.

"Samantha is a tiny girl," her mother said. "She has to work on her strength. She has a lot of grace and flexibility."

Beyond her physical skills, Samantha "has become very disciplined," Donna continued. "She knows when she comes home from the gym, her homework has to get done. There's no whining or complaining. It gets done."

She's already found a favourite event, as her performance in Oakville suggests. "I like beam the best," she said. "I think it's the most fun to do."

Samantha has enjoyed gymnastics from the moment she first saw it demonstrated. That was about three years ago, when she was at the Promenade Mall. A gymnastics club put on a show and Samantha "thought it looked great," Donna recalled.

"I brought her to the club, the coach looked at her and saw her flexibility, her strength and her bone structure. She felt she could be a competitive gymnast.

"I didn't know what I was getting into," she added. Samantha's schedule means lots of extra carpooling and schedule-juggling.

Last year, Samantha's summer included a stint at a gymnastics camp in Pennsylvania. This summer there's the U.S. meet and she's already planning to enter the Metro East qualifying meet next December – the first step on route to next year's provincial championships.

Can you spare $232 million?

As I was saying...

By RON CSILLAG

Another week, another disappointing vote by Canada on the world stage.

This time, it wasn't another dagger in Israel at the United Nations, but a little-noticed approval of a $232 million (US) loan from the World Bank to Iran for a sewage treatment project in Tehran and for improvements in health care.

No, I'm not anti-sewage treatment or opposed to better health care for women and children. But nothing talks like money, and international forums like the World Bank are afforded many opportunities to convey their disapproval of something or other in countries where human rights are an oxymoron.

Ottawa did not approve the loan, and neither did it oppose it. In an almost weasel-ly fashion, Canada (and France) abstained, thus squandering a golden chance to express real condemnation of the continuing farce that is the closed-door "trial" of 13 Iranian Jews accused of spying for Israel.

Montreal Liberal MP Irwin Cotler, who's been following the proceedings as closely as anyone, comes to Canada's defence – sort of.

He says Finance Minister Paul Martin, who is fully apprised of the "Iran 13" situation, has been "superb" on the loan issue. It was Martin, Cotler said, who instructed the Canadian representative to the Washington, D.C.-based World Bank, Terrie O'Leary, to successfully seek a postponement of the vote until more was known of the detainees' fate. But the rules say only one postponement of any vote is permitted, and the balloting took place May 19.

Cotler is quick to add that despite her noncommittal vote, O'Leary (who also represents Ireland and the Commonwealth Caribbean nations) and other board members who approved the loan, issued a strongly-worded statement saying their vote should in no way be construed as support for current events. That's not unlike saying, "I saw you commit a crime; I'm not saying you did not commit the crime; but I'll lend you the money you want anyway."

The rest of the 24-member executive board of the World Bank, including Britain, voted in favour of the loan. The United States opposed it because it has a law that prohibits it from taking part in international loans to countries that are on its list of state sponsors of terrorism. Washington walks a fine line on this. It stuck to its principles on anti-terrorism, and has objected to the trial, while trying to mend fences with Iranian reformists and telling the Iranian people that it bears them no ill will.

In condemning the vote, the prickly and irascible Senator Jesse Helms noted the obvious. Said the long-time North Carolina Republican and chair of the powerful Senate Foreign Relations Committee: "I believe all Americans should be offended. Do voting members of the World Bank believe that as a kangaroo court in Iran continues its relentless persecution of 13 Iranian Jews, we should continue business as usual?"

Cotler sees a glimmer of hope in all this. Iran, he feels, is where the Soviet Union once was in its treatment of Jewish Refuseniks and dissidents. "The very fact they felt compelled to engage in a trial," he explained, "shows that they are not unresponsive to international pressure."

And also like the old Soviet Union, the Iranian Jews are magically "confessing" to their crimes, referring to Israel, as do the Iranian media, as "the Zionist entity."

The World Bank explained that the loan will better the lives of ordinary citizens, while bolstering the reforms of President Mohammad Khatami. But after the vote, World Bank chair James Wolfensohn said future loans would depend on the progress of reforms in Iran. That's like saying, "You've misbehaved. Here's your money, but watch yourselves."

In the final analysis, Cotler thinks Canada should have voted against the loan. The loan would have been approved anyway, and Canada could have joined the United States in standing fast to principles.

Not this time. Maybe next.

MONTREAL CHEESE BAGELS

THIS RECIPE BROUGHT TO YOU BY...

HERB CAPLAN

WE SELL Amana FOR LESS

1111 Weston Road (S. of Eglinton) 767-1655

www.caplanappliances.com

Filling:
- 1 lb. dry cottage cheese
- 1 egg
- 2 tbsp. sugar
- 2 tbsp. lemon juice

Dough:
- ½ c. butter
- 2 tbsp. sugar
- 1 egg
- ½ c. sour cream
- 2 c. flour
- 2 tsp. baking powder
- ¼ tsp. salt
- melted butter

Combine cheese, egg, sugar and lemon juice and mix until smooth for filling.

For dough, beat butter, sugar and egg until fluffy. Add sour cream alternatively with flour, baking powder and salt to a smooth dough, dusting with flour if it gets too sticky. Divide dough into ¼'s; roll each piece on a lightly floured board into ¼" thick rectangles.

Place some filling along one edge of each dough rectangle and roll up. Cut rolls into 8" lengths and form into bagel shapes, pinching edges together to join. Brush with melted butter.

Bake at 350° 35-40 min. on a greased baking sheet. Serve hot with sour cream. Yield: 1 doz. May be frozen after baking.

About Seniors

Several leading medical journals offer the charming and instructive device of reprinting short sections from their pages of 100 years ago.

These pieces are always entertaining yet frequently outdated – but not always. In fact they can still speak to the heart of our clinical practice, even after a century in which medicine has changed so dramatically.

Dr. Mark says...

For example, in a recent issue of the Journal of the American Medical Association, Dr. J.W. Bell, a century ago a medical professor at the University of Minnesota penned an impassioned "Plea for the Aged." And it should be pointed out that in 1899, geriatrics as a specialty did not yet formally exist.

Dr. Bell offered a criticism that is unfortunately still quite relevant today: "The want of interest, as indicated by the scanty and fragmentary character of the literature on the subject, is largely responsible for the apathy existing to-day in our medical schools."

It must be admitted that just as we enter the new millennium, there has been some modest improvement in the number of Canadian schools offering a course in geriatrics. Still, the growth is not at all proportional to the increase in the numbers of elderly. In 1899 Canada's population enjoyed a rate of less than five percent over age 65. Today, that percentage has almost tripled and life expectancy, even at age 80, has gone up most significantly.

Despite his critique, Bell understood the curricular wars of the medical schools, which are still fought out today. He offers that "it would seem criminal to even suggest the addition of another distinct course to the already overcrowded college [medical] cirriculum." (sic)

But he does offer two suggestions, the first of which still makes sense today: "That the chairs of anatomy and physiology impart to the student the necessary primary instruction." His second suggestion may today seem a bit quaint, but it obviously arose from the faint hope that his plea might be heeded by colleagues. Here, Bell suggests that the "chair of... [internal medicine], or... in order to contrast disease, the chair of pediatrics enlarge its scope and furnish the necessary... instruction."

JAMA's recent column has helped us realize that, at least in the field of the elderly, despite some improvement, "the more things change, the more they remain the same."

Israel's UN isolation ends

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

After more than 50 years, Israel's isolation at the United Nations has come to an end, and Canada has won plaudits for helping to bring that about.

On May 26, Israel was finally invited to join one of the regional groupings at the UN, the Western Europe and Others Group, known as WEOG – something Canada has long championed.

Since its admission to the UN in 1949, Israel had been the only country to be barred from any of the world body's regional blocs, thus preventing the Jewish state from sitting on any UN committees and exercising influence in key areas.

Joe Wilder

Israel will now be eligible for nomination to several UN committees, including, potentially, the Security Council.

There are several conditions attached to Israel's membership in WEOG, but officials welcomed the move as a historic breakthrough.

Yehuda Lancry

Israel's ambassador to the UN, Yehuda Lancry, told Diaspora Jewish officials the development is a "historic turning point in our relationship with the UN. It is really a new chapter we are opening with the family of nations."

The Israeli Foreign Ministry said the move "marked the end of four decades of discrimination and injustice," referring to the first time Israel was denied membership into the Asian regional bloc at the UN.

In a statement, Joseph Wilder, national chair of the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC), said the "discriminatory treatment of Israel has finally been rectified."

Wilder also praised Canada's efforts in securing Israel's membership, and Canada's "ongoing, active support for steps to normalize Israel's status at the UN and in other international institutions."

Michael O'Shaughnessy, a spokesperson for the Foreign Affairs department, told The CJN that Canada "has actively supported granting Israel temporary membership in WEOG, and is pleased WEOG has reached consensus in allowing Israel to attain membership."

Israel now finds itself in the same regional grouping as Canada, the United States, western European Union countries, Australia and New Zealand. Consensus from all 26 member nations was needed and secured.

Lancry sent a formal letter of acceptance to the Dutch ambassador to the UN, who currently chairs WEOG.

Since 1960, Arab nations have repeatedly denied Israel's admission to the Asian Group, to which it belongs geographically.

But there are several strings attached to Israel's membership in WEOG.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Nazi Ad Sparks Suit

TORONTO — The National Ballet of Canada has launched a $1-million lawsuit against Now magazine for publishing an ad that compared the dance company to Nazis in their handling of the Kimberly Glasco affair.

The full-page ad listed a number of war-era Jewish artists, including Alexander Granach and Kurt Weill, who were dismissed from their positions "not for artistic reasons." The ad claimed Glasco suffered the same fate.

In 1998, James Kudelka, then the ballet's new artistic director, did not renew Glasco's contract. Glasco sued, alleging she was fired.

The suit will proceed despite a full-page apology from Now. A lawyer for the ballet said the comparison to the Nazis was "extremely hurtful" to the ballet and to Kudelka personally.

Degree for Feld Carr

SUDBURY — Judy Feld Carr, a native of Sudbury, was awarded an honorary doctor of laws degree by Laurentian University at its spring convocation on June 3. From the early 1970s to the mid-1990s, Carr ran a secret operation in which some 3,200 Jews were rescued from Syria.

ISRAEL

New Olim

JERUSALEM — A total of 7,850 new immigrants from the former Soviet Union arrived in Israel during the first two months of 2000, a four percent increase over the same period a year ago, the Jewish Agency for Israel has reported.

Falash Mura On Way

JERUSALEM — The Jewish Agency is flying 100 Falash Mura from Ethiopia to Israel. Agency officials say the group is the first in a wave of some 5,000 to 6,000 people who will soon be flown to Israel. Thousands of Falash Mura – Ethiopians whose ancestors converted from Judaism to Christianity – have amassed in transit camps in Ethiopia hoping to immigrate to the Jewish state.

Polish President Visits

JERUSALEM — Polish President Aleksander Kwasniewski paid a three-day official visit to Israel last week. Activists who claim Poland is ignoring Jewish calls for the return of assets stolen during the Nazi era promised to hold protests.

Lesbian Couple Wins

JERUSALEM — An Israeli lesbian couple has won the right to be registered as the mothers of a son born to one of them through a sperm donor. In a landmark decision, the Supreme Court last week ordered the Interior Ministry to register Nicole Brener Kadish as an adoptive mother to the four-year-old son of her lesbian partner.

WORLD

Shul Burns Down

PHILADELPHIA — A fire set by arsonists has destroyed a synagogue here. Police said the fire was set at Beit-Harambam Congregation by one person who broke in through a back window. The blaze destroyed Torahs and prayer books, gutted the synagogue's interior and left some 300 congregants without a house of worship.

Cemetery Attacked

ATHENS — Greece has condemned an attack by vandals on the main Jewish cemetery in Athens. Vandals attacked the cemetery May 26, painting Nazi slogans and symbols on its Holocaust memorial as well as on dozens of graves.

Zundel in Attendance

IRVINE, Calif. — Toronto pro-Nazi publisher Ernst Zundel was among several sympathizers who attended the kick-off to a three-month speaking and fund-raising tour by celebrated Holocaust denier David Irving here, the Los Angeles Times reported last week. Zundel joined such prominent deniers as Arthur Butz of the United States and Robert Faurisson of France to hear Irving speak at a secret location here, the newspaper said. Irving recently lost a high-profile libel lawsuit against U.S. Holocaust historian Deborah Lipstadt.

Temple Reopens

HAVANA — Cuba's Jewish community marked the inauguration of a newly renovated temple, Bet Shalom, in Havana last month. Attending the ceremony were Jewish delegations from several countries.

'Robin Hood Rabbi' Gets Seven Years

MONTREAL — Joseph Prushinowski, the so-called Robin Hood Rabbi convicted last month of multimillion-dollar fraud, will spend at least the next three years behind bars in an Israeli penitentiary.

Prushinowski, who fled Montreal in 1987, was recently handed a seven-year prison sentence by a judge in Jerusalem.

Authorities dubbed Prushinowski the Robin Hood Rabbi and the Chassidic Robin Hood because he allegedly distributed his ill-gotten funds to unwitting chassidic communities around the globe for housing, education and charitable causes.

He was convicted May 2 of having defrauded financial institutions around the world of about $200 million by using multiple false identities, dummy corporations, bogus offshore banks, and trading on his status as a religious Jew.

Montreal police have been told that Prushinowski, 61, will be on probation for 18 months after serving his sentence, and if he is found guilty of a similar offence within three years of his release, he will automatically be returned to jail for another 18 months.

He is likely to appeal his sentence, and will serve his sentence in the prison where he has been since his arrest in 1998. That jail time will count toward his sentence, making him eligible for parole in just over three years.

Over the years, Prushinowski has been pursued by the RCMP, the FBI, Scotland Yard as well as New York and Dutch police.

Israeli MKs 'threatened' by Canadian proposal

Could be charged with war crimes under new legislation

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Under new legislation being considered by Parliament, members of the government of Israel who visit Canada could theoretically become the subject of extradition requests as alleged war criminals.

According to Prof. Ed Morgan, who teaches international law at the University of Toronto and is honorary counsel for Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC), there is a potential problem with one specific article in the proposed legislation.

The legislation, Bill C-19, is aimed at facilitating Canada's membership in the International Criminal Court (ICC), which was established to prosecute modern-day war criminals. It is also an attempt by the federal government to facilitate the prosecution in Canada of perpetrators of genocide, war crimes and crimes against humanity.

A CJC delegation led by Morgan last week presented a brief to the House of Commons standing committee on foreign affairs and international trade, which is considering the legislation. CJC urged the government to ensure that the extradition provision in the proposed legislation not be abused or exploited by political considerations.

The concern CJC has with the bill, Morgan explained, is that it criminalizes "the transfer, directly or indirectly, by the occupying power of parts of its civilian population into the territory it occupies."

The inclusion of this provision and specifically the word "indirectly" in the Rome Statute two years ago, at the insistence of the Arab states, caused the Israeli delegation to withdraw its support for the Rome treaty. The Rome Statute established support for the ICC.

The provision itself is not the problem, said Morgan. The concern is with the potential politicized use of such an article, in particular by the Arab states against Israel.

Some people fear that, theoretically, a visiting member of the Israeli government or of a former government that authorized the building or the expansion of Jewish communities on the West Bank, or any other policy that someone might argue resulted "indirectly" in the "transfer of its civilian population, might be made the subject of an extradition request by a foreign government hostile to Israel.

"In principle, CJC welcomes Bill C-19 and we commend the government and Foreign Minister Lloyd Axworthy for their leadership in seeking to institutionalize the search for justice against perpetrators of war crimes, crimes against humanity and genocide," Morgan said.

"We would like Canada to make it crystal clear that they will not extradite anyone

Zundel's appeals rejected

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Holocaust-denier Ernst Zundel is facing tens of thousands of dollars in legal costs and the prospect of his human rights case resuming, thanks to two recent decisions by the Federal Court of Appeal.

In back-to-back unanimous decisions of a three-judge panel, the court slapped down Zundel's attempt to seek early judicial reviews of legal decisions made by the tribunal hearing his case. The court also rejected the neo-Nazi's contention that one of the tribunal members may be biased against him.

A tribunal of the Canadian Human Rights Commission (CHRC) is hearing allegations that Zundel, a distributor of pro-Nazi propaganda, operated a Web site that

The message of freedom

From the editor's desk

As the sun slides this evening through the starlit heavenly corridor into the sixth day of Sivan, Jews around the world will be celebrating Shavuot, the second holiday of our religion and nation-defining pilgrimage trilogy.

Seven weeks after the people of Israel were emancipated from their slavery in Egypt some 3,500 years ago, they gathered at the foot of Har (Mount) Sinai, the low-lying, craggy, desert mountain, to hear the Emancipator give them His Ten Commandments.

That was the beginning of the transformation.

An unruly, wary, tentative, psychologically wounded rabble of individuals was on its way to becoming a free, freedom-loving, confident cohesion of distinct tribes but of one people.

But first, they would have to expunge from their psyches what the scars on their backs from the taskmasters' slashing whips had seared into their souls: the mindset and the outlook of a slave, the inbred sense of inferiority and worthlessness.

Not surprisingly, even though they actually saw the mountain tremble, felt its fire and heard the blaring blasts of the shofrot, after the accumulated indignity and suffering of centuries, they could not do that.

Moses saw this and understood the bittersweet truth that the message of human freedom would be carried into the Promised Land by the first generation of children whose backs would not be scarred by the whip or bowed by the weight of bricks and clay.

It was his historic purpose to teach that message to the first generation of free children. And it was their privilege to learn from Moses what had been the even greater privilege of their parents to hear directly from God.

A very poignant iteration of that "message of human freedom" was expressed by Joseph Hertz, the late chief rabbi of Great Britain.

"[Shavuot] is the anniversary of the Divine proclamation of the Ten Commandments, which remain for all time the fundamental rules of Right for all men. On that day, there was something new under the sun. A whole people was consecrated to a sacred task, that was to shatter the stone heart of heathendom, and render possible the coming of a new heart, obedient to righteousness and throbbing with pity and human brotherhood."

Etching by Gustave Doré

The message of freedom that Moses taught to the children of Israel was destined to become, in Rabbi Hertz's poetic words, a consecration to "fundamental rules of Right for all men."

This is what we must remember on Shavuot: Israel's "sacred task," to again borrow Rabbi Hertz's words, then and now, is to be an exemplar for all peoples of those "rules of Right."

How we do that and whether we are any longer able to do that is the subject of the important essay by Prof. Gil Troy that appears on page 9.

He urges readers to relate to our Judaism and thus, by extension, to the essential values and messages for which Judaism stands, in a positive and as a positive force. He calls for us to embrace our faith as something in which to feel great pride, something precious, something to be "hugged."

Troy wants us to discard the notion of a Judaism which is simply a set of restrictions. Our freedom, Troy pointedly writes, must be freedom for something, on behalf of something, in favour of something and not merely from having to do or perform some key obligation.

His argument is persuasive.

There is a beautiful and evocative midrash (homily) that describes the moment when the Torah was given at Mount Sinai to the children of Israel.

"Rabbi Abbahu said in the name of Rabbi Yohanan: When the Holy One gave the Torah, no bird chirped, no fowl flew, no ox lowed, not one of the offanim angels stirred a wing, not one of the seraphim said, 'Holy, holy, holy!' The sea did not roar, creatures did not speak; the whole world was hushed into breathless silence; it was then that the voice went forth: 'I am the Lord your God.'"

That single, awesome, frightening moment changed the course of human history. Everything and everyone stopped to reflect upon and to comprehend the true nature of our freedoms. On Shavuot, so should we. MBD

Ritual directors form new group

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO – They may complain to each other or make jokes about the long hours and multiple demands of their jobs, but the bottom line – according to members of the newly formed Ontario Ritual Directors' Association (ORDA) – is that synagogue ritual directors wouldn't be there if they didn't like what they do.

So far the Toronto-based group has seven members, including one from Hamilton. ORDA president Asher Tannenbaum, ritual director of Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Congregation, anticipates the group will eventually expand. A native of Montreal who moved here in December, he said some of his contacts in Montreal have expressed interest.

Asher Tannenbaum

Tannenbaum and Cantor Marshall Loomer, who serves as cantor/ritual director/spiritual leader of the 350-family Congregation Adath Shalom, each had the idea of creating an organization of ritual directors and chazzanim shniyim. But it wasn't until a few months ago, when Tannenbaum spoke to his colleague Baruch Hoffman at Adath Israel Congregation, that he was eventually put in touch with Loomer and the two began working to make the idea a reality. Loomer wrote letters to other colleagues inviting them to be part of the new endeavour.

"I think we all felt the need," said Danny Allman, ritual director of Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue, who, like the others, had networked with his counterparts informally.

The members spoke to The CJN at ORDA's third meeting, held last week at Adath Israel, where Hoffman has been ritual director for the past 11 years.

At 51, he is ORDA's senior member.

Among the group's goals is setting and maintaining standards for bar and bat mitzvah teaching, which is often part of their job description. They also want to share experiences and learn from each other.

"We want to add credibility and professionalism to this profession," said Tannenbaum, who left the business world for the synagogue to turn his avocation into a full-time career.

Many American cities have such organizations, noted Loomer.

Although ORDA is open to any denomination, thus far members are all affiliated with traditional Conservative congregations.

A ritual director's job is hard to define, said the ORDA members. Different ritual directors may have different responsibilities. There's no school for ritual directors. Lorne Hanick, ritual director and b'nai mitzvah tutor at Beth Tzedec Congregation, has two degrees in Judaic studies, which he said "enhance" his job. "The practical skills I need for this job – like Torah reading and nusach – I learned independently."

"Everyone here knows how to daven, how to be resourceful, how to conduct life cycle events," said Loomer. "And we all probably swore we'd never work for a shul," he quipped.

Most of them teach bar and bat mitzvah students, are responsible for weekday minyans and have administrative duties. Some of them will substitute for the chazzan when he is not available. They're also called upon often to answer congregants' questions. Allman serves as building manager in addition to his other duties.

"You've got to wear many hats to be a ritual director," added Loomer.

The pool of candidates for ritual director positions is shrinking, said Hoffman, an American with an MBA who had his own health food business when he lived in Israel in the 1980s. In the past, he noted, many ritual director positions were filled by European immigrants with traditional backgrounds.

ORDA members all have traditional backgrounds, but "even guys who learn in yeshiva" may not be suited to the job if they can't sing or aren't people-oriented, he said.

"We are the maitre d' of the shul," said Hoffman, "We're the ones that show [new mourners] how to put on tfillin and show them how to say Kaddish."

In the summer it's not uncommon for him to put in a workday that runs from 7 a.m. to 9:30 p.m., with perhaps a few hours off in between.

"If you like people," he began...

"It's a very rewarding profession," concluded Tannenbaum.

URGENT APPEAL TO HELP A FELLOW JEW BLINDED FOLLOWING A VICIOUS ATTACK

Mr. Vizel, father of 17 children, was the victim of a vicious, senseless, anti-semitic attack in New York, that left him with severe head injuries and totally blind. As a result of the attack, Mr. Vizel is no longer able to provide for his family who now have the daunting responsibility of caring for their permanently disabled father.

No one should ever know the tragedy and suffering the Vizel family has endured and continues to endure. This once self-sufficient family has been reduced to relying on the generosity of their Jewish brethren for a meagre existence.

We ask everyone to help them in whatever way possible. There can hardly be a greater or more worthy Charitable donation.

Sincerely,

Conference looks at role of psalms in healing

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Healing has to take into account the multiple dimensions of a person's life — physical, cultural, social and religious, said a leading rabbi in the field of Jewish healing.

Rabbi Simkha Weintraub, rabbinic director of the National Centre for Jewish Healing in New York City, was speaking at the second biennial conference of the Toronto Jewish Healing Project, co-ordinated by Etta Ginsberg-McEwan. The day-long event, held at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue, was called Don't Rely on Miracles, Recite Psalms.

Rabbi Weintraub, the keynote speaker, used rabbinic text to illustrate a number of points, among them:

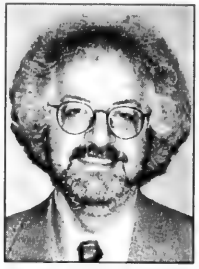
• People always complain about the question, "How are you?" he noted. "It comes attached to the answer, 'I'm fine.' That's not the whole story."

• Even healers need help to heal themselves.

• Community plays an important role in healing, as does touch.

"Victorian" attitudes have gotten in the way even of appropriate touch, noted Rabbi Weintraub.

One theme that occurs in Jewish stories of healing concerns "mutual weeping" as a healing source. This challenges much of what doctors have been taught, the rabbi said.



Rabbi Simkha Weintraub

Rabbi Weintraub believes that psalms can be used in at least seven ways in Jewish life, including ritual, prayer, song and meditation.

"We need to reapproach [psalms] in a new light," he said, noting that even though he has an Orthodox day school background and majored in Jewish studies as an undergraduate, he "really didn't turn to the psalms in my own suffering, until some bridges were built for me."

The words of psalms may offer new ways of communicating for those who lack words of their own to express their feelings around illness, suffering or loss, he said. The psalms are a flexible resource, he noted, because they don't require a quorum of ten, nor do they need to be said at certain times of the day.

For many people, however, it's not helpful to tackle a whole psalm, Rabbi Weintraub said. "For them, I think it's helpful to select a line, a phrase or even a single word to carry within their hearts."

Respondents to Rabbi Weintraub were Rabbi Dow Marmur of Holy Blossom Temple, and family physician Dr. Yoel Abells. The day also included a number of related workshops. Participating clergy included Reform, Conservative and Orthodox rabbis.

Resources such as support groups bring comfort and strength, said Rabbi Marmur, and the use of traditional texts provides context. "The pain doesn't disappear, but it becomes more bearable."

There is more spiritual healing in sharing questions than answers, he said.

From a medical standpoint, Abells noted that although medicine was once the domain of spiritual leaders, in the technology-oriented 20th century, there was "no attempt to focus on the person as a whole." He recalled his days as a medical student, when patients often heard bad news from doctors and students discussing their case at their bedsides.

"There was no malicious intent," he said. "Just ignorance and stupidity. Professionalism was the term used."

On a personal level, Judaism guides his approach to patients, said Abells, who began his talk by reciting a doctor's prayer. "Medicine not transcended by spirituality is like a body without a soul."

'Pirate' radio explores wide variety of issues

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Like radio commentators everywhere, Jay Shapiro has an opinion on just about every subject.

The proposed trans-Israel highway, for example, is "the biggest mistake in Israel."

The abrogation by the PLO of its charter was "a fake."

Israel's elites and its courts are a "problem."

The courts make decisions "that make Israel less Jewish."

Israeli Arabs are "a hostile minority whose loyalty is to Arafat."

Syrian strongman Hafez al-Assad is "a rotten dictator of a fourth world country that makes a living off of drugs."

And so on.

Once a week, Shapiro gets to air his views during a 45-minute talk show on Arutz 7, the "pirate" radio station that broadcasts to Israel from a ship outside Israel's territorial waters.

A landlubber originally from Philadelphia, Shapiro need never get a whiff of the Mediterranean's salt air during his broadcasts. Comfortably ensconced in his home in Karnei Shomron, 30 kilometres east of Herzliyah, he uses a telephone to link up to the station, and his signal is then rebroadcast back to Israel from offshore.

For 2½ years, he's been calling it like he sees it on a wide variety of social and political issues, and not once has station management tried to modify his comments, he said. His views, it is clear, fit in nicely with those of the station, which Shapiro describes as "nationalistic radio that tries to be balanced."

Founded in 1988 by Ya'akov Katz and Rabbi Zalman Melamed of Beit El Yeshiva Centre Institutions, the station's goal is "to combat the negative thinking and post-Zionist attitudes so prevalent in Israeli's liberal-left media," its Web site (www.a7.org) states.

In some quarters the station has been called "settlers' radio" and "pirate radio," but Shapiro maintains it is more balanced and even-handed than Israel's state-run radio and television stations. It gives a voice to Israel's religious community, which is barely represented on mainstream radio stations, and it balances the overwhelmingly leftist orientation of the Israeli media, Shapiro contended.

Arutz 7 is located offshore because it is difficult to get a licence from the Israeli broadcasting authority. In February 1999, the Knesset passed a law granting the station legal status, allowing it to continue broadcasting, with the need for approval by the Israeli radio and television authority, said Arutz 7 spokesperson Yisrael Medad.

Unlike Israel's government-controlled media, Arutz 7 is privately financed through donations and advertising and has listeners among all segments of the Israeli population, he added.

Shapiro was in Toronto recently as part of an 11-day North American visit. He spoke to about 60 people at Yeshivat Or Chaim. His presentation was sponsored by Lior Tobias, a young man unaffiliated with any organization, but who has been impressed with Shapiro's radio commentaries since first hearing them 18 months ago. Shapiro's show is carried live on the station's Web site at 2:15 p.m. on Thursdays and an archive of prior shows can also be accessed on the Internet.

Tobias said he asked Shapiro to come to Toronto because "I felt the need to wake up Canadian Jewry. They're not thinking about the real problems in Israel."

An inquiry into more than the quality of water

To its credit, the government of Ontario announced last week that it would establish a public inquiry into the circumstances surrounding the drinking-water-related deaths in Walkerton. To its shame however, the government made the announcement only reluctantly, after more than a week of sharply expressed outrage by concerned citizens from all walks of life and from all across the province.

At least seven people in Walkerton, a small town of about 5,000 people, are known to have died after drinking the town's water which became contaminated by the deadly E. Coli 0157:H7 bacteria. Four previous deaths are now suspected to have also stemmed from the poisoned water. Around 1,000 people were made seriously ill by the water.

The calls for a public inquiry reached their peak last week after a series of revelations fell like related pieces of domino tiles, one after the other, onto the pages of local and national newspapers. The revelations were triggered earlier in the week by Dr. Murray McQuigge, the medical officer of health responsible for Walkerton, who angrily disclosed that the town's public utilities had still been pumping water days after it knew the water supply had been compromised. Subsequent statements, allegations and revelations cast further doubts upon the town's public water utility, the private laboratories testing the quality of water, and upon the Ministry of the Environment itself.

As of this writing, neither the terms of the inquiry, nor for that matter, the identity of the official who will lead it, are known.

It is imperative that the parameters of the inquiry be broad. The search for truth must not be confined to the narrow physiological line of causation that led to the deaths. The private litigations that will undoubtedly arise from this tragedy can and will follow the trail of that line more effectively and more appropriately.

Rather, the search for truth, for the answers to the "Walkerton water tragedy" must follow the questions that the wider public interest demands be answered. Alas, in these circumstances, that wider public interest now includes examining the role we expect our governments to play in providing the day-to-day essentials of our lives.

Governments cannot ensure against all exigencies; nor do reasonable people expect them to. But surely, in the year 2000, in the province of Ontario, the quality of the water that flows into our homes must not be considered an exigency. The delivery of safe drinking water is one of the very basic, fundamental, uncompromising expectations that reasonable people have of their government to fulfil, along with, one might add, high quality education and health care.

What are the reasonable limits upon a government policy that places at risk the fulfilment of these basic, fundamental expectations? That is one of the important questions for the public inquiry to answer.

We should be shouting

As the 13 Iranian Jews await their sentences, I cannot help but ask, "Are we awake, fully, completely awake? Are we blind to the reminiscent nightmares of the past, when the world stood silent?"

For the sake of our brothers and sisters, for the sake of humanity, we should be rallying in the thousands outside the Iranian Embassy, yelling and shouting – Let our people go!

If we don't, next week or the week after, we will all be wearing the cloak of guilt, while we sit comfortably in our homes or offices reading in the newspaper how 13 Jews were hung, God forbid, asking ourselves, what did we do?

Implications of Lebanon exit

In many of the discussions concerning Israel's recent withdrawal from Lebanon, certain facts have either been underplayed or not properly explained at all.

The key to understanding Israel's withdrawal from Lebanon is a full comprehension of United Nations Security Council Resolution 425, adopted on May 19, 1978. This resolution, passed in the wake of Operation Litani – an Israeli military operation against PLO bases in southern Lebanon in reaction to a wave of terrorist attacks on Israeli civilians – calls first and foremost for "strict respect for the territorial integrity, sovereignty and political independence of Lebanon within its internationally recognized boundaries." This clause effectively calls for all foreign forces, including Israel, but not only Israel, to withdraw from Lebanon.

Now that Israel has complied unconditionally with that part of Resolution 425 directed at it, it is incumbent upon the international community, including Canada, to ensure compliance by other foreign interests including Syria (and Iran) to do the same.

Finally, Resolution 425 calls for the government of Lebanon, with the assistance of the UN, to impose "effective authority" in southern Lebanon. This has several implications:

- The government of Lebanon must take decisive action to establish control over the border region with Israel, including disarming and disbanding all militias, especially Hezbollah;
- The UN should immediately reinforce the UNIFIL peacekeeping operation in southern Lebanon. Acting upon the offer extended by Prime Minister Jean Chrétien during his recent trip to the Middle East, Canada should formally advise the UN of its willingness to commit Canadian personnel to an enhanced UN force;
- The UN, through Resolution 425, is also committed to assisting the Lebanese people in rehabilitating their country after many years of strife. This is something that Canada should also be encouraged to participate in. From an Israeli perspective, the rehabilitation, independence and stability of Lebanon are crucial elements of regional peace and security.

True face of Ontario government

On May 17, according to provincial Hansard, Ontario education minister Janet Ecker stood up in the provincial legislature and boasted (in reference to the United Nations human rights committee ruling) that "when we were challenged by the United Nations and the federal Liberals to back off that commitment [to public education], we stood firm and said no."

The United Nations human rights committee's ruling was very simple. They said: "Provide an effective remedy to end the religious discrimination in Ontario." They did not tell Ontario and Canada how to end the discrimination; they left it up to both the federal and provincial governments to provide the solution. They did not rule that money should be removed from the public education system. They did not recommend taking money away from Catholics for the religious education of their children. They simply said religious discrimination against Jews in Ontario, manifested in the education funding formula, is wrong and must be eliminated.

So now we see the true face of this government. Not only do they ignore calls to end the religious discrimination against Jews in Ontario, they are proud of perpetuating it. And the Canadian government is ducking the international responsibilities into which it freely entered.

Will Jewish voters and financial contributors to the Conservative party of Ontario now call the premier and ask him to explain the words of his senior minister?

Israeli Arabs' behaviour disconcerting

There is no question but that the State of Israel will accommodate the fleeing South Lebanese soldiers and their families, most of whom are Christians and would come to harm at the hands of the mercenary Shiite Muslims, Hezbollah.

What is disconcerting is that leaders of Arab villages do not want these newcomers living in their communities. First and foremost, the South Lebanese Army for 22 years provided protection for all Israelis guarding Israel's northern border. The security that the SLA provided was not just for Israeli Jews but also for Israeli Arabs. The Arab leaders' first and foremost commitment is as Israeli citizens and they do not enhance their position in Israel by discriminating against the SLA soldiers and their families.

As it has done with a variety of displaced persons from all over the world, Israel will accommodate this newest group of refugees, whether they eventually settle in Jewish towns or in Arab communities. This commitment to the displaced is one of the foundations that makes Israel strong and unique.

Let us create a Judaism that we are thrilled to embrace

By GIL TROY

Poor Shavuot, the Feast of Weeks. This most important festival, celebrating the giving of the Torah, is a most neglected holiday. Most North American Jews celebrate Passover. Alas, not only do most non-Orthodox Jews ignore Shavuot, they do not even know it exists.

To be fair, Shavuot lacks a good shtick. Cheesecake eating cannot compare to the home-based drama of a Pesach seder, or the guilt-inducing grandeur of the Yom Kippur fast. Even Sukkot, the other major but neglected festival, at least has fun booths to build.

But the problem runs deeper. Pesach is popular because most of us relate better to deliverance from Egypt than to the delivery of the Law. For too many of us, our freedom is defined and limited by our slavery. Our freedom, our Judaism, is defined as "freedom from" – freedom from Pharaoh, freedom from Egypt, freedom from oppression.

We just ended this bloody millennium which was bookended by the Crusades and the Holocaust. It is not surprising that when the older generation of exiles from Europe or from the Islamic lands choose which holiday to celebrate, when they experience Judaism, they experience it as freedom "from" the horrors of the past. That was the central challenge for Judaism over the last 2,000 years, to figure out how to live freely as Jews.

Truth be told, we have mastered this "freedom from" kind of Judaism. Rooted in our common past, we have defined our history as a vale of tears, as an historical epic defined by one oppression after another: the Inquisition defines 400 years of rich Jewish life in Spain; the Holocaust defines 900 years of rich Jewish life in Poland.

Thanks to this trauma-focused reading of history, our community, and especially our community leadership, has become addicted to a theology of guilt and a politics of fear. "Don't Let Hitler Win" becomes our 614th commandment.

We guilt too many Jews into not breaking the chain, into not breaking their parents' or grandparents' hearts; we scare others with Arabs or neo-Nazis, with anti-Semites and Holocaust deniers.

For four millennia now, Jewish identity has been about covenants, commitments, and compulsion. Most Jews were Jewish not because they wanted to be but because they had to be. Sometimes these definitions were imposed internally, sometimes externally. No wonder our freedom was always expressed as "freedom from."

This, however, by and large, is yesterday's story.

If we look to the ultimate beginning point of the story of Shavuot starting with the enslavement of the descendants of Jacob in the Book of Exodus, 1:8: "and a new Pharaoh arose in Egypt who did not know Joseph," we can find a parallel today.

In our times, the Jewish story might begin: "and a new generation arose throughout most of the Jewish world that did not know Pharaoh" – that has not experienced anti-Semitism as intensely.

In this new millennium, Jewish identity is largely voluntary. Most Jews, thank God, are free. North American society in particular is an open shuk hawking 1,001 different identities for as long or as short a time as any one wants. My students, my peers, are – as the popular Marlo Thomas song from the 1970s declared – "free to be you and me."

Alas, too often the Jewish community has responded to the threat posed by freedom by trying to find a new set of compulsions, by guilting, cajoling, and mourning. We are stuck in a "freedom from" kind of Judaism when we need a "freedom to" kind of Judaism, an affirmative Judaism, a Judaism not defined by our oppression, but defined despite our oppression.

Let me be clear. I am an historian. I am not advocating forgetting our past. I am simply suggesting that all our memorials and commemorations and justifiable laments and still palpable fears need to be better balanced: we need a Judaism of joy not just sorrow; we need a community that is inclusive not exclusive; we need institutions that are more responsive than impressive; – we need a relationship with Israel in which we truly recognize its centrality to the Jewish people – rather than just relating to it as the central headache of the Jewish people – and we need to listen to the injunction from the Passover Haggadah: Tseh U'Lmad (Go out and learn) – not be taught, learn!

We need to engage our Judaism, to learn about it in the deepest of ways, and to see it as an anchor in this world and as a pathway to our humanity not as something separate from or in opposition to our identity as human beings.

These impressions – which have been building for years – were confirmed by my experiences this February when I accompanied 200 Montrealers and 20 Haligonians on the launch of the Birthright Program, Charles Bronfman's and Michael Steinhardt's $300 million initiative to send 18-to-27-year old Jews to Israel for free.

This is a bold, maniacal gamble, a dramatic attempt to save the community. It holds deeply Zionist assumptions about the importance of Israel in the Jewish world. And, ultimately, it is critical of the community: it acknowledges that things are not working, that we need to think outside the box, because the box itself, while beautifully decorated, is often stale and uninviting.

On that trip:

• I saw the joy of secular Jews dancing in the Shabbat to Shlomo Carlebach niggunim, (tunes), the first Friday night at the Wall, the second Friday night on the beaches of Tel Aviv.

• I felt the power of the community forged, an amazing camaraderie, that was often accompanied by a critique of the status quo, as participants said they had not met Jews like this before.

• I watched Birthright as an institution in formation, dedicated to giving the participants a fun and meaningful experience, naturally fall into a Martin Buber "I-thou" relationship with participants, trying to understand their needs; all too many existing institutions distinguish themselves with their "I-it" approach, the standoffishness and insularity that makes so many unaffiliated remain unaffiliated.

• I witnessed a return to the first principles of Zionism, viewing Israel as an answer to our Jewish problem; not a poor weak cousin for us to protect. Such an approach reversed the polarities, transcending the usual equation.

• And I reconfirmed that by understanding the Zionist message that Judaism is both a nation and a religion, participants could better appreciate Judaism as a response to their current concerns as humans. The New York Times has diagnosed a new disease: affluenza, influenza of the affluent. All these children of wealth grow up showered with material possessions and yet feel empty. When I speak to my McGill students, I urge them to find a framework, to find an alternative anchor. When I speak to Jewish students I say, "here's a framework we already have. It works. Try it. Take from it what you can, it's yours."

Now, on one level, these are what we call in the American history biz, "apple pie" suggestions. Who is going to disagree that we need more joy, that we need to be more welcoming, that our institutions need to be more responsive, that we need to love Israel and learn from it, rather than just defend Israel and write cheques for it, that we need to see how Judaism speaks to our souls. But, in fact, it is easier said than done. And each of us has to conduct our own private searches to find examples of the kind of Judaism I have criticized, in our own Jewish lives, in our own Jewish spaces.

Pogo, in the old Walt Kelly comic strip said, "I have met the enemy, and it is us." I have seen the Jewish past and it is here, in Montreal, throughout North America. But I have also seen the Jewish future and it is here, I hope.

Recently, I have seen signs of progress. I have seen this Birthright program revolutionize the lives of thousands throughout North America. I have seen a consortium of synagogues, Reconstructionist, Conservative, and Orthodox, in Cote St. Luc and Hampstead, celebrate Simchat Torah together, rejoicing as one community. I have seen 750 Jewish students in Montreal "wake up" and celebrate Purim in the wildest, most joyous Purim party I have ever seen, that rocked until 3 a.m. And I have seen new rabbinic leadership that brings a Shlomo Carlebachian joy to the task of leading even Montreal's most venerable congregation into the 21st century – understanding that we have to dance Jews into the synagogue, not guilt them into it.

This file photo of children in Israel celebrating the Shavuot "harvest" resonates with the call by the author for us to experience a Judaism that we "are yearning to hug." [Isranet photo]

Our challenge is to free ourselves from this "freedom from" Judaism – and to figure out how to create a Judaism that we are not just free to embrace, but that we are proud, and thrilled, and yearning to hug. It is not easy; but nothing about Jewish life ever has been. This, however, can and should be a most happy and holy labour of love, that – because Judaism is a communitarian enterprise – we will undertake together.

Shavuot, the holiday during which we reflect upon our freedom under law is also a good and fitting time to reflect upon our freedom for that happy and holy labour of love we call Judaism.

Opinions

The kids are coming

Once a year I write a column about a subject which only a minority of readers will relate to in their everyday lives, and therefore they may decide they don't want to read any further. Maybe I can persuade them to stay with it this time, for they'll learn of a change that is taking place in Israel.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

To be sure; it is small, but also highly innovative – and that's why I think more people ought to know about it. Have I caught your attention?

If so, you will be interested to learn that a marginal activity in Israeli life presents a most unusual scenario: Jewish and Arab children, who would never come in contact with each other, let alone socialize on any level, are afforded that opportunity — and they are taking advantage of it in increasing numbers. How is this minor miracle accomplished?

Seventy Arab youngsters now play tennis at the Jaffa Tennis Centre and are totally integrated with their Jewish counterparts.

Sixty children from the Arab village of Jisser-el-Zarka, where living conditions are below par and where even electricity is a problem, play tennis at the Haifa Centre.

Forty Bedouin children do the same at Beersheva, seven Druze children now play at Kiryat Shmonah; and at Caesarea the six to nine-year-old players represent an even number of Jews and Arabs. And because the young Arab kids have not yet learned to speak Hebrew the Centre provides them with Arab coaches who form a link to families, school and the community.

Here's how Helen Schary Motro, an American writer and attorney living in Israel, recalls the launching of this new venture: "Listeners sitting before the flaming fall sunset heard words seldom spoken in Caesarea, and indeed rarely in all of Israel. The speaker was addressing the mixed crowd in Arabic. Some of the beaming parents of the fledgling tennis players were wearing blue jeans, while others wore floor length embroidered dresses and white head scarves."

Thanks to donations from private philanthropists [in Israel, Canada and the United States] a segregated world has been breached. In addition to learning tennis, plans are being made to provide educators to help the children with their homework on three afternoons. Caesarea has put its country club at the disposal of the project, and transportation will be provided.

Great things have small beginnings, and programs of this type may be of this genre. If you want to see some of the children who participate in these activities you'll have your chance on Sunday, June 18, when they are coming to Toronto.

You don't have to be a tennis aficionado to enjoy an exhibition that will warm your heart. And, to boot, the price is right: you can watch them for the sheer pleasure of it, without paying a cent (if you can remember what that is). Call 905-660-1999 for details and location.

One lonely stone at Dachau

It rained the morning I went to Dachau. I didn't want to be there. Raining or not, visiting a concentration camp was not part of my vacation plans.

It was the tour guide's idea. We had extra time between leaving Munich and arriving in the Rhine Valley. The group, made up of mostly Canadians, Australians, and New Zealanders, shouted yes when they were given the choice.

Jennifer Fox on campus in Halifax

I shouted no.

This was my first vacation in three years and I wasn't mentally prepared to visit Dachau. This of course is a ridiculous statement since no one, Jew or gentile, is ever mentally prepared to be taken to Dachau. Still, I thought it odd to visit a place that murdered people en masse the morning after visiting a beer hall.

But I went. Even though I could have stayed with the bus in a nearby car park, I couldn't be so close and just forget where I was. So I walked into the rain and into the camp.

Dachau is not like other camps that were left in the same state as when the Germans left them. The barracks where people were crammed inside are gone. Instead, long and thin rectangles are marked out on the ground showing where the structures once stood.

At first I thought the rectangles were garden plots. I couldn't imagine what so many buildings so close together would have looked like. Nor could I imagine what it would have smelt like or if the air was hard to breathe or not. All I saw was space and I knew that was wrong.

This wasn't what I thought a concentration camp would be. I've heard stories from those who have visited camps in Poland as part of March of the Living. They saw piles of shoes and glasses and human hair. There were scratches on the walls of the gas chambers as people fought to escape.

I didn't want to be haunted by such images but in Dachau there's no evidence of people. How do so many people disappear?

I walked away from the main part of the camp and towards the crematorium.

The ovens used to burn the dead looked like any other wooden oven. Or maybe there was a difference but I couldn't tell as my glasses were dotted with drops of rain and tears.

I tried to say the Mourner's Kaddish out of respect but I had forgotten the words. I whispered I'm sorry instead.

The last part I saw was the Jewish Memorial Temple built on the grounds in 1965. It is stone and cylindrical. The opening is wide but inside it's cave-like. There are only two light sources – the entrance and a small opening at the top of the cylinder. Above the cylinder is a menorah. When I looked up all I could see was the menorah and a little bit of sky.

Jewish pride is found even in the darkest of places.

I placed a stone by the memorial to show I had visited. Not a solely Jewish tradition, but something I learned when I visited Yad Vashem in Israel. There, memorial statues are filled with so many stones that they seem part of the statue itself.

My stone at Dachau was all alone.

It still rained as I returned to the bus. My whole face was red from crying. I said nothing to the person beside me, just stared out the window.

I didn't know how I felt about what I'd seen or about deciding to go.

I saw so many things on my European vacation and I could tell you what I thought about all of them. But not this. I can only explain what I saw.

I'll probably never understand what I felt.

A disgruntled student volunteer

I wonder. I wonder about people's perceptions of students. And I wonder about how much credit students are given for their initiative and creativity.

As a student leader in the Montreal Jewish community, I have sat around many boardroom tables observing various committees of "adults" assign tasks of physical labour and mindless nothingness to students. Admittedly, in the same breath, these committees commend their students for their perseverance and dedication to certain projects.

Erica Horn on campus in Montreal

This praise, however, is worthless; it is meaningless because students focus on actions rather than words. Our parents, community leaders, elementary and high school teachers and even our university professors, teach this lesson to us. It is fine for Prof. X to say that (s)he is an easy marker, but until students have been privy to their flexibility with the red marking pen, the words mean nothing.

Community leaders instruct us to lead by example to encourage participation in various activities, but so long as they fail to treat us with deserved respect, their words float like dead weights in the air.

I have learned this lesson well. When I write in my column about attending Expos games and encourage my readers to follow suit, I make sure that I can be found at the Big O in section 123 on home game nights. When I encourage members of the Jewish community to protest on behalf of the 13 Iranian Jews imprisoned in Iran on charges of espionage for the United States and Israel, I make sure that I do more than simply write the words down for national publication.

Joking that students can be put to work stuffing envelopes or piling chairs is one thing; making the request is another. Students don't mind helping with physical labour if it means feeling involved but it is unfair to assume that students should necessarily be the ones put to work.

I know the rationale is "students are young and have more energy" and I agree, but that doesn't allow for assumptions to be made. We are young and we probably do have more energy, but that doesn't preclude others from helping us, or from using us for more than our physical strength.

Students have great ideas. These great ideas materialize into large productions because we have an overwhelming degree of drive. You can ask us to pack your boxes and poster our campuses but why not also put our ideas to work.

Use our energy in a positive manner, to benefit your organizations. Use us for what we are good at and for what we have in abundance. No one consults an astronaut on legal matters just as no one asks a lawyer about the retrograde rotation of Uranus.

It is possible that you sense bitterness in this column. I am not bitter, simply weary. I am under the impression that students are taken for granted, and allow themselves to be, because they think being involved in any capacity is better than nothing.

This disgruntling analysis has rendered me fearful of graduates who think that volunteering at a food bank is all about lifting vats of butter and slicing kilos of tomatoes. It is really about the people you are helping and the service you are providing.

Sometimes students allow themselves to be swallowed up by the power-hungry who view students as free-labour-intensive help. We should not be put in such situations to begin with.

I need to know: now that I have graduated, do I still fit into the "I am a student and therefore am eligible to be put to work" category? Or now that I no longer spend my days in the wonderful world of academia am I exempt from such tasks? I wonder.

The Kirshner File

'All the news that's fit to print'

I have enjoyed reading the New York Times for many years now. I read it because it is quite authoritative and reasonably balanced in its coverage of American and international news.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Adolph Ochs, the son of German Jewish immigrants bought the newspaper in 1896 when it was deeply in debt. He promised to produce a "clean, dignified and trustworthy" publication that would present the news impartially. From a historical perspective, he and his successors have succeeded beyond their wildest dreams. Today, the New York Times is certainly one of the world's finest dailies.

But, as Susan Tifft and Alex Jones suggest in The Trust (Little, Brown), a history of the families that control the paper, there have been glaring occasions when it has not lived up to Ochs' exalted credo.

In 1929, when stock markets crashed and a catastrophic depression ensued, the editors chose Admiral Richard Byrd's exploration of Antarctica – an expedition the Times had sponsored – as the most important news story of the year. More egregiously, it minimized the Holocaust, usually burying crucial, heart-wrenching stories in the back. On July 4, 1944, a dispatch reporting the deportation of 400,000 Hungarian Jews received a paltry four column inches on page 12. On the same day, a story about Fourth of July holiday crowds ran on page 1. Talk about news judgment!

"Had the Times highlighted Nazi atrocities against Jews, or simply not buried certain stories, the nation might have awakened to the horror far sooner than it did," write the authors admonishingly.

How can one explain such lapses? Judging by The Trust, a fair-minded account of a dynasty, Ochs set the tone from the outset. An assimilationist who believed that Jews should keep a low profile, he decreed that the Times should never appear to be a "Jewish newspaper." The person who succeeded him as publisher in 1935, son-in-law Arthur Hays Sulzberger, took his command to heart.

Sulzberger, whose reign lasted more than a quarter of a century, was ambivalent about his Jewishness. Projecting his insecurities onto the newspaper, he played down the ethnicity of Jewish reporters by deracinating their bylines. Abraham H. Raskin, for example, was A.H. Raskin to readers of the Times.

The New York Times

In keeping with this philosophy, Sulzberger was, for many years, an anti-Zionist. He rejected Palestine as a haven for Jews, except as one of several places to which Jews could flee, and opposed the idea of a separate Jewish state. The Times backed the 1947 Palestine partition plan, not because it supported Jewish sovereignty, but because it wanted to lend a voice of confidence to the still-fragile United Nations.

"My attitude toward Israel is the same as my attitude toward Indonesia," he told a Jewish weekly. "I wish it well, but am completely without nationalistic fervour toward it."

As a student at Columbia University, Sulzberger was shunned by gentile fraternities, a rejection that embittered him. Yet, as the Times' publisher, he himself was a party to anti-Semitism. At his direction, the paper published business ads that included code words like "restricted" and "selected clientele," shorthand for No Jews Allowed. His rationale was that Jews should be forewarned of bias. He halted the practice in 1943 after being informed that it was patently illegal.

His successor, Arthur Ochs Sulzberger, the publisher from 1963 to 1992, broke with the past by appointing a Jew, Abe Rosenthal, as top editor. The current publisher, Arthur Ochs Sulzberger Jr., is halachically non-Jewish, since his mother was a Christian. Although he was married in a Presbyterian service, he considers himself Jewish. A friend, however, is quoted as saying that Sulzberger is "kind of resigned" to his Jewish heritage. Like, perhaps, Adolph Ochs?

Memoirs of an editor

Max Frankel, executive editor of the New York Times from 1986 to 1994, claims in The Times of My Life (Random House) that Arthur Hays Sulzberger was careful to "never put a Jew in the showcase."

In plain language, he did not want a Jew as editor because he feared that the paper would be devalued in gentile circles.

Frankel, the son of Galician Jews expelled from Germany two weeks before Kristallnacht, began writing for the Times in 1949 when he was still at Columbia University.

Posted to Vienna in 1956, he subsequently reported from Moscow and the Caribbean. In 1973, he won the Pulitzer Prize for a series on president Richard Nixon's historic trip to China.

Frankel, in this engaging memoir, reviews his career as a foreign correspondent. He has plenty of interesting stories to tell, but there is an undercurrent of resentment when he recalls the way in which his analytical pieces were ruthlessly mauled by editors in New York City.

Speaking of "destructive deletions" and "erroneous insertions," he observes: "Some days, while reading your own story, it was hard to hold down breakfast. More than once, some of us were driven close to resignation."

Frankel stayed the course, and prior to his appointment as executive editor, he was in charge of the influential editorial page.

Glancing backwards, he regrets having written an editorial in which he denounced Israel's 1981 bombing of Iraq's nuclear reactor: "It is folly to hold nations to a standard of 'law' in an anarchic world," he notes, adding that he has always been "deeply devoted" to Israel.

Frankel was editor when the 1991 Crown Heights riots broke out. Here, too, he acknowledges a lapse in judgment. "I did not give enough prominence... to the rioting... Our reporting... was thorough and fair. But we were distracted... by the simultaneous and fateful coup in the Soviet Union."

As mea culpas go, this one may be understandable. Who could have known, in the heat of events, that the Crown Heights affair would have such far-reaching consequences?

Film tribute to Moroccan refugees

By AVI BENLOLO

Kudos to the Toronto Jewish Film Festival for choosing to screen the recently released Israeli film, Egoz (1999). Produced by acclaimed Israeli director Eli Cohen (The Summer of Aviah and Buzz), the film was among the first ever produced documenting the journey of Moroccans to Israel.

Egoz was the name of a ship that capsized off the coast of Morocco in 1961.

The tiny vessel was carrying some 40 Jewish refugees en route to Israel via Gibraltar. While their story ends tragically, the film exemplifies the sacrifices many Moroccans made in their attempt to get to Israel.

Although Morocco was fairly hospitable to Jews compared to other countries, the government was hostile to any attempt by Jews to immigrate to Israel. Any intention to immigrate was interpreted by the government as a renunciation of citizenship and immediately classified the individual and their family as enemies of the state.

For this reason, many (if not most) Moroccan Jews who left the country did so under guise. For example, many Jews fled by pretending to go on vacation to Paris. From there, they would immigrate to Israel as refugees. Most often, they escaped with only what they could carry, leaving their assets behind to be seized by the state.

Egoz wonderfully projects the story of how one family was torn apart over the issue of whether or not to immigrate to Israel.

Some family members were indeed willing to take the chance of arrest by fleeing to Israel. Others were reluctant to leave, since they would have to give up the life they had built in Morocco. Their knowledge of the hardship awaiting them in Israel was another impeding factor.

Egoz's most significant contribution, however, is that rather than focusing on traditional stereotypes, it highlights the socio-economic affluence that many Jews achieved in Morocco. For example, the family on which the film is based was educated, owned a luxurious hotel in Casablanca and had formed relationships with government officials.

In fact, the king of Morocco's court often included Jewish advisors and consultants. Most recently, the king's minister of finance was Jewish.

Historically, Jewish involvement in government has led Moroccan people to have a stronger affinity with the Jewish communities in Morocco and, more recently, in Israel.

For those seeking further insight into Jewish immigration to Israel from Morocco, Egoz is possibly the best film ever made depicting this period of history.

It's worth trip to Salt Lake City

By ZE'EV GLICENSTEIN

As of this writing, more than 600 people have registered for the 20th International Conference on Jewish Genealogy, scheduled for Salt Lake City, July 9 to 14. Most are American but some will be coming from as far away as South America, Europe, Israel and Australia.

Why are so many Jews shlepping to Utah? For genealogists, the key attraction is the Family History Library of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints. Housed in a four-storey building in downtown Salt Lake City, the Mormon-built library is the world's most comprehensive genealogical research facility. It could reasonably be nominated, along with the Genome Human DNA Mapping Project, as one of the wonders of the modern world.

Established in 1894, the library began to microfilm records in 1938, and greatly accelerated its rate of acquisitions in the postwar era. At present, hundreds of LDS camera operators are busy at work in dozens of countries, microfilming birth, marriage, death, land, tax, census, passenger and other records.

The collection presently boasts about 2.4 million reels of microfilm, 700,000 microfiche, and 280,000 books. It grows, on average, by 5,000 reels of microfilm and 1,000 books every month. According to director David Rencher, the library holds information on at least two billion people.

"Our estimates calculate that there are about six billion people in recorded history, of an estimated 72 billion that have ever lived," he says. "We believe we've collected about one-third of all genealogical related records ever made."

The Mormon Church has gone to extraordinary lengths to make the collection accessible. Its satellite network of some 3,400 library branches worldwide includes 129 in Canada. "It would be safe to say that we're the largest private library system in the world," Rencher says.

In May 1999, the library opened an Internet site (www.familysearch.org). Initially expecting as many as five million "hits" per day, representing about 80,000 visitors, LDS officials built it to handle five times that capacity. To their astonishment, that wasn't nearly enough: it quickly crashed under the weight of up to 100 million hits daily, and was soon revamped and expanded.

"We've had industry experts tell us that ours was the fastest site in the history of the Internet ever to go 'large,'" says Richard Turley Jr., managing director of the Church's Family History Department. (Turley is giving the conference's keynote talk on The Family History Department: Its Past, Present and Future.)

The conference offers many more attractions besides the LDS Library and its strong Jewish collections. There are vendor exhibits, resource and computer rooms, power breakfasts and lunches with genealogical specialists, and talks on diverse subjects including the latest research developments in Belarus, Czech Republic, Galicia, Germany, Hungary, Latvia, Lithuania, Moldova, Poland, Romania, Slovakia, Ukraine and the United States.

While you're surfing, check out http://www.jewishgen.org/jri-pl/. That's the Web site of Jewish Records Indexing – Poland, the ground-breaking project through which more than 700,000 Jewish vital records from 19th-century Poland are listed in an index that is searchable online.

The fast-growing index lists close to 10 percent of the Jewish vital records from Poland microfilmed by the Mormons. It also contains citations for thousands more Jewish documents, typically from the 1880s and later, most from the Lodz region not yet microfilmed.

The idea for JRI-Poland came from Stanley Diamond, president of the Jewish Genealogical Society of Montreal and one of many volunteers who have made it the great resource it is today.

Torah online

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

In a previous column, we looked at some of the weekly Torah commentaries that are available on the World Wide Web. But what if you want to read the original Torah? No problem – if you know where to look.

One of the most impressive sites that I have come across anywhere is World ORT Union's Navigating the Bible [http://bible.ort.org/]. This remarkable site is a one-stop resource for anyone studying Torah. There are many goodies here, such as a calendar to look up the proper Torah and Haftorah readings for any Shabbat.

And there's even an atlas and maps so you can follow the Israelites on the trek to the land of Israel or illustrations of wildlife mentioned in the Bible. The very readable English translation was written by the late Rabbi Aryeh Kaplan for his work The Living Torah.

But the centrepiece of the site is the online Torah. Every verse of the Torah can be viewed in Hebrew, Hebrew transliterated into English and English [http://bible.ort.org/bible/index/inx_tora.htm]. In addition, each Hebrew verse appears both as it is written on Torah scrolls and as it is seen in a Chumash with nekudot (vowels) and trope (musical notation). And since each verse appears as a picture rather than text, you can read the Hebrew on your computer even if you don't have Hebrew fonts installed. And last but not least, if you want to have the verse sung to you, simply click on the speaker icon and you'll hear Cantor Moshe Haschel perform it for you.

The folks at Breslov.com have also done a great job - but you need to have Hebrew fonts installed to really appreciate it [http://www.breslov.com/bible/bible.htm]. Here you'll find the Hebrew, English and even Aramaic translations for every verse in the Tanach. And to top it off, each verse is linked to the corresponding one at the Navigating the Bible site.

Any student of Torah knows that it is virtually impossible to learn Torah without the commentary of Rashi. You can find the scholar's entire work translated into English at the Torahscroll site [http://www. torahscroll.com/bible]. The Metsudah site contains an English translation of the Chumash, Rashi commentary and text footnotes, as found in the Metsudah Chumash [http://www.mnemotrix.com/metsudah/].

I have found a couple of amazing lists that document hundreds of other Torah-related sites such as Eric Simon's Torahnet Page [http://shamash.org/reform/uahc/torahnet/]. But my favourite list is not only an impressive piece of work, it also has a great name: The Electronic Torah Warehouse [http://eparsha.homepage.com]. The Warehouse is the work of Joshua Cypess, a rabbinic student and educational co-ordinator at Yeshiva University. (Bonus: check out Joshua's cheeky answers in his site's frequently asked questions section.)

Anyone who has been honoured with haghah in synagogue knows the challenge of trying to hoist a Torah gracefully into the air. Thanks to modern technology, you can effortlessly lift a Torah in the palm of your hand. A company named Penticon Technologies is creating Hebrew products for Palm Pilots – and some of them are free at their Web site [http://www.penticon. com/moadon.html]. Download the week's Torah reading and you'll still have room in your palm for the five megillot, Mincha, Ma'ariv, Birkat Hamazon – and a must for all mobile Palm users: Tfillat Haderech – the Traveller's Prayer.

Jewish – Does It Make a Difference?
by Elvira & Mihai Nadin, Jonathan David Publishers, Inc. $23 (US)

Books
Bernard Baskin

How would you answer the following questions? Does it make a difference to you that you are Jewish? Why? How? Or: Why not? In your opinion, are there any values that remain distinctly Jewish? Which ones? How do these values guide you in your outlook and in your daily life?

The authors of this unusual book believed that these questions were especially pertinent today because the world in which Jews live has changed radically in the last 50 years. Official anti-Semitism has practically disappeared. The Soviet Union collapsed. Jews have their own land in the modern State of Israel. More importantly, many of the values that originated in the Torah and that Jews have preserved and developed throughout millennia have been integrated in secular, non-Jewish society.

Over a six-year period, the authors distributed questionnaires and interviewed Jews worldwide – from Hollywood to Istanbul, from Cologne to Rome – to find answers. The respondents included well-known personalities as well as "average" hard-working Jews, some old, some young, some highly observant and some completely uninvolved in Jewish life. Most of the responses were positive. One must assume that negative thinking Jews or assimilationists didn't became involved in the project.

Some of the varied answers follow:

Being Jewish is the privilege and the burden of belonging to perhaps the oldest literate, moral and religious heritage, unbroken in its continuity, far more durable than any national sovereignty has ever succeeded in lasting. –Yehudi Menuhin, violinist.

Jewishness is complicated. It influenced all, or almost all, of my plays. –Arthur Miller, playwright.

To be Jewish means to be contaminated with humour. –George Burns, comedian, actor.

I don't know about my role in the continuity of Judaism. I only know that without Jews the world would have no flavour. It would be like soup without salt. –Hannah Jordan, stage designer.

Although both my parents were Jewish, I feel that I am more of a passive type of Jew. Being Jewish means being committed to a legacy of caring social activism and the possibility of creating a better and more just and compassionate social order. Being a Jew also means being committed to Israel. For me, Israel is the most significant aspect of Judaism, now and in the future. –Tom Lantos, U.S. Congress representative from California.

For me, Tolstoy was wisest in his attempt to explain what is a Jew: "The Jew is the source and well from which all other nations have drawn their religions and beliefs… The Jew is the discoverer of freedom… The Jew is a symbol of civic and religious tolerance… The Jew is a symbol of eternity." –Arthur Gelb, former managing editor of the New York Times.

I don't care about Israeli politics or various sects in Judaism. I don't care if someone goes around with payes down to his ankles, or whether he votes for Likud or Labour. I am a Jew and all Jews are my brothers. Better said, I try to be a Jew by studying the Torah and donating my money so others can study it in order to become better people. –Kirk Douglas, actor.

This volume stimulates thought and self-inquiry as readers must decide how they would answer the questions.

Emunah honours three

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Dealing with paraplegia is no problem, scoffs Batya Feigenbaum. "I'm 15; my problem is dealing with my parents!"

This kind of inner strength was honoured by Emunah Women of Toronto at its annual dinner, held recently at Shaarei Shomayim Congregation.

The religious Zionist organization paid tribute to three people who, said co-president Edie Kalb, have dealt courageously with adversity: Feigenbaum, a student at Bais Yaakov high school; Orna Wellman, one of whose children was disabled in an accident; and Judith Rubinstein, a Holocaust survivor.

Feigenbaum talked about the time at camp when she watched her friends swimming and climbing."I had to pretend I was having fun, even though sitting in a wheelchair in the heat isn't terrific."

She recalled a passage from Proverbs that says people will relate to you the way you relate to them.

"No one likes someone who is miserable," she said. "Everyone has their own problems, which they think are huge because they are their problems."

We are not obligated to never be sad, she said. "But we are obligated to get over it."

The surprising thing, she said, is that when you pretend to be happy, you become happy.

Together with one brother, Rubinstein was the only survivor of a large Hungarian family. She lectures about her experiences before the war and in Auschwitz-Birkenau, to "pay tribute to all the mothers and sisters – good, innocent people."

Her father, she said, sang L'Shana Haba B'Yerushalayim at the end of the Pesach seder with tears running down his cheeks. "I only understood his feelings when I was homeless myself. He didn't have the zhut, the merit, to witness the rebirth of our country."

She urged people to also remember "those brave young people who gave their lives so we could live in peace..."

Emunah Women, said Rubinstein, recognizes that our children are "our assurance that Am Yisroel Chai, that the people of Israel live, and that they (the children) will be able to take their place in the world."

Nearly six years ago, Wellman's son, Adin, choked on a grape at a neighbourhood supermarket. He now is in a stimulation program at Bloorview Macmillan Centre, and, his mother told The CJN, although he can communicate only with his eyes, "is in the process of rehabilitation."

Wellman said that she coped with what happened with "faith in God's greatness."

"God says that reality is the presence of miracles. I believe in miracles."

Pain is everywhere, she said, adding that without it, people wouldn't learn how to struggle and succeed.

Her faith in God gives her a sense of optimism, she said. "I knew that I was invincible. I knew that God would come through for me."

She doesn't deny that even with faith, "confusion and despair can set in. You wonder if God has forsaken you."

The key to survival is laughter, she said. "If you can't laugh at absurdity, you won't survive."

It is not inspirational to suffer, Wellman said. "What's inspirational is what we do with [that suffering]."

Blanket yourself with people who can offer you love, support, wisdom and laughter, she said. And remember that "if we have HaShem in our soul, we have a role [in his plans.] The power of prayer allows us to demand from God, to plead to him. That's what emunah, faith, is."

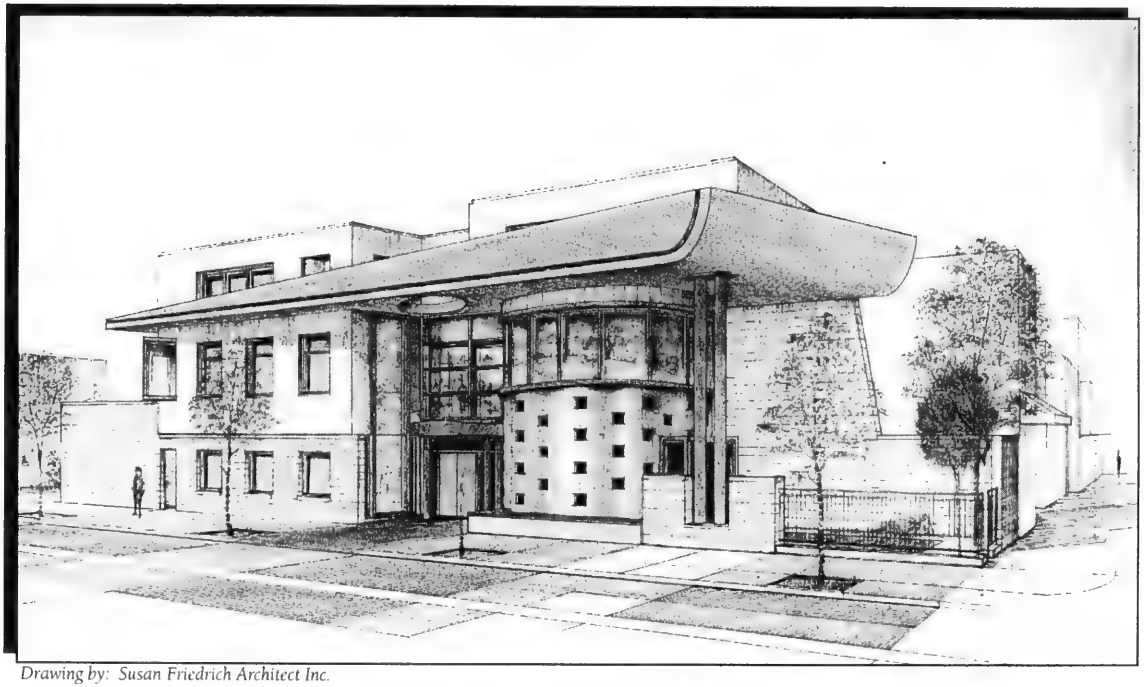
Marlene Segal and Joyce Rifkind presented graduating Ulpanat Orot student Laura Shiderman with a scholarship, which she will use to study at Midreshet Lindenbaum in Israel.

National Emunah president Judy Pachino said that Emunah is the only global – and the world's largest – women's religious Zionist movement. "It is in 30 countries, and every continent except Antarctica."

A crisis centre that Canada had pledged to furnish is nearly complete, she said.

The organization also provides services to various segments of Israeli society, including special education students, day care centres, children in crisis, and for pastoral counselling.

Another Dream Come True



Drawing by: Susan Friedrich Architect Inc.

Since 1996, the hub of Jewish life at the University of Toronto has been a cramped basement from which Jewish Campus Services is providing programs for nearly 5,000 students. As part of Jewish Toronto Tomorrow (JTT), an initiative led by UJA FEDERATION and our generous donors, these students will soon benefit from their own warm, spacious home away from home. The new Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life, at Harbord and Huron, will link Jewish students to their history, heritage and the larger community. It's one of the many dreams made possible by JTT's new partnership with visionary philanthropists and agencies seeking funds to meet urgent needs. Jewish Toronto Tomorrow is the bridge between challenges and solutions. Between dreams and reality. The Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life is another Jewish Toronto Tomorrow dream come true.

Secular and religious Jews not divided, rabbi says

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The dichotomy between secular and religious Judaism may be a false one, says Rabbi Dow Marmur, spiritual leader of Holy Blossom Temple.

"Whatever secular Judaism may be, it's not necessarily the opposite of religious Judaism, because Judaism cannot be expressed without religion," he said at the recent Louis Lenkinski memorial lecture sponsored by the Polish-Jewish Heritage Foundation of Canada.

Rabbi Marmur, president and one of the founders of the foundation, said that at the bar mitzvah of Lenkinski's grandson, Lenkinski, a secular Jew, was called to the Torah and read the blessings. "I understood why Louis would have a mezuzah on his door; he may have viewed it as a folk symbol with only a residual religious connotation. But to praise God for having given us the Torah is no sociology; it's theology," he said.

He said that Irving Howe, a Jewish academic and student of American secular Judaism, said Jews have tried to find ethnic, national and cultural substitutes for the religion of their fathers, though in this effort they have had to recognize that the religion they were putting aside was itself a crucial part of the culture they wished to preserve.

"In the writings of the early Jewish radicals, there is a recurrent imagery derived from the religion they have abandoned." Howe wrote.

That implies, Rabbi Marmur said, that though you may be able to take a Jew out of Judaism, it's virtually impossible to take Judaism out of a Jew.

"Religion permeates all aspects of Jewish existence... it cannot be expurgated from one's life as a Jew, whatever one's ideological commitment may be. A Jew can be with God or against God, but not without God."

The distinction between religion and secularism, and the determination to show that they are not incompatible in the spirit of Judaism, Rabbi Marmur said, "is still characteristic of much contemporary Jewish life and thought, even though there are some who believe in the need to entirely separate the two – not in order to safeguard the Jewish religion, but to remove religion from the agenda of Judaism.

"Of late, however, this radical approach of total separation is being abandoned even by avowed secularists," he said.

The experience of the Holocaust and the establishment of the State of Israel have a lot to do with it, said Rabbi Marmur. "Even adherents of Jewish secularist organizations who have survived the Holocaust and relocated to other countries, have come to affirm... traditional Judaism on the grounds that [its] preservation is yet another way of not letting Hitler have a posthumous victory."

The term Jewish religion is misleading, Rabbi Marmur said. "It implies a symmetrical counterpart to the Christian religion, and that isn't possible. Christians insist that there is a real divide between them. For them, the unredeemed world is bifurcated between flesh and spirit, the church and the world."

Jews, on the other hand, believe that it's impossible to make clear distinctions between the religious and the secular, he said.

"The Hebrew Bible does not even have a word for religion, let alone secularism. Its content is both secular and religious, as are the texts of rabbinic literature.

"The sharp distinction between secularism and religion is more at home in Christian thought than in Jewish life, even when Jews have borrowed the terminology," Rabbi Marmur said.

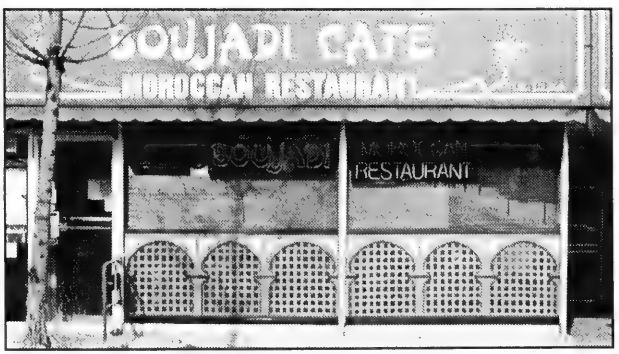
BOUJADI MOROCCAN RESTAURANT



The wonderfully exotic flavours and fragrances of Moroccan cuisine are exquisitely presented at Boujadi, where meals are meant to be savoured slowly, mouthful by mouthful. Dishes are prepared fresh from scratch, resulting in a truly sensuous dining experience. Portions are large, prices reasonable, the service prompt and courteous.

Highly recommended is the Marhaba, a large platter including many popular Moroccan features such as couscous, vegetables, merguez, kafta, olive/lemon chicken and stuffed phylo pastry. A delectable variety of vegetarian dishes is offered as well.

Also noteworthy is the genuine warmth and hospitality of owner/chef Charles Obadia and his staff. A pleasurable visit, in every respect.

הן מגיעות למלון ניו יורקי מפואר. והינה נעצרת המעלית בקומה כלשהי, ולמעלית נכנס גבר שחור ענק עם כלב לא פחות גדול. בעוד השתיים מנסות שלא ליצור מגע עין עם הזר, מתחיל הכלב ללקק את המסכנות.sit down מצווה בעל הכלב, ושתי התל אביביות מתיישבות על רצפת המעלית, כמו גם הכלב. הענק פורץ בצחוק גדול, שממשיך להדהד גם בצאתו מן המעלית.

כעבור מספר ימים , יורדות השתיים לסגור חשבון עם סיום השהייה, מבשר להן פקיד הקבלה שהחשבון שולם במלואו, ובמכתב שהושאר להן כתוב: תודה על שהצחקתן אותי את צחוק חיי. על החתום: מייקל ג'ורדן. יורם פירוצקי

יציאת לבנון

צהל יצא מלבנון ללא פגיעות בחיילים , אך בישראל, שבה יש תמיד מי שינסה לעשות הון פוליטי, היו אלה שדיברו על ההשפלה של הפינוי, ועל זה שחיזבאללה כבש את כל הכפרים שנעזבו לאור קריסת צבא דרום לבנון. עכשיו אין ללבנון עצמה כל תירוץ לא להגיע לשלום עם ישראל. תמיד אמרו לנו בילדותינו שלבנון תהיה השניה לשלום. שניה היא לא תוכל כבר להיות, אבל שלישית כן.

"I guess Polly knows that Shavuot is coming!"

Israel continues debate over Zionism: author

By ANNA TURKIENICZ
CJN Staff

TORONTO — The founders of the State of Israel would be astonished to see the current state of Zionism.

In his new book, The Jewish State: The Struggle for Israel's Soul (Basic/New Republic Books), Yoram Hazony argues that the mainstream artistic and academic world in Israel is laying the groundwork for a major break from the Zionism envisioned by the early founders of the state.

Most of the debate has focused on the new historians, like Benny Morris and Avi Shlaim, Hazony said in an interview, "and this has meant that the debate has formed around the question of whether they are doing good historical work.

"However, there is a far greater issue at stake here. In Israel over the past 10 to 20 years, the mainstream academic world has been arguing that Zionism and the central purpose of the State of Israel is unjust."

Today, the law of return, the question of the Star of David on the flag, removal of the words "Jewish soul" from the national anthem, have all become issues open to debate by mainstream academics and artists, as they move away from traditional labour Zionism.

Hazony agrees that you need open academic and artistic debate in a free and democratic country; the problem in Israel is that there isn't any substantial public opposition to these new trends.

And this anti-Zionist direction is appearing in all aspects of academic life – from philosophy and literature to political science and legal analysis, Hazony said.

For example, recently all mention of the Jewish people has been removed from the Code of Ethics of the Israel Defence Force.

It isn't that the people of Israel don't care about these changes. Rather, it is that they are completely focused on security and peace concerns. Issues of national importance, such as the crisis in the national health-care system, the looming water shortage or changes in the education curriculum, are not given very much attention by the Israeli public, he said.

Yoram Hazony

When committees made up of these academics manage to significantly change public policy so that it runs counter to Zionist beliefs, it is done with little awareness on the part of the Israeli public.

The new history curriculum used in Israeli schools today became a public issue in Israel only after the New York Times dealt with it last summer.

The current curriculum is based on a completely different approach to Jewish history than was intended by the founders of the State of Israel, Hazony said. David Ben-Gurion and his education minister Benzion Dinur felt that the purpose of the education system was to unite the children of Israel and give them roots. The focus of the curriculum, therefore, was on those aspects of history common to Jews, no matter where they came from.

The current curriculum uses a more "universal" approach, where each Jewish community stands on its own. The focus is on the non-Jewish civilizations and their influences on the values and culture of the Jewish communities within them. In this way, Hazony said, one of the basic values of Zionist thought, which teaches that the Jews are "one" people, is neutralized.

Zionism, according to Theodor Herzl, is based on the notion of "peoples," and as long as these people have their own legitimate needs and problems, it is necessary to have a state.

"The real need," Hazony said, "is defined by national interests and each national case has to be looked at individually. In Israel today, the Jewish people have irreconcilable needs that are in conflict with the needs of the Arab people."

In Canada, he said, where the issue of Quebec nationalism arises, the question that must be asked is: Do the people of Quebec really have separate interests that are irreconcilable with the anglophone people?

The question that has to be asked in Israel is: "Can the Jews live, in the long term, a dignified, safe and fulfilling life without the existence of the State of Israel?

"After World War II, the Zionist answer was: No, they can't.

"Today, we have to ask whether we have reached the point where humanity has made a break with the past so that national interest is no longer a decisive factor in politics. Some people believe that there has been a fundamental change in human values.

"I don't," Hazony said.

"Zionism was created so that the machinery of the state could hear the needs of the Jews everywhere. Ben-Gurion said that [before the State of Israel] nowhere in the world was there a country that would intervene for the Jews, no matter where they were.

"States look after the interests of their own people."

If Jews are in trouble in Ethiopia, then Israel makes the effort to go out and help Ethiopian Jews, Hazony said. It doesn't matter where Jews are, the Jewish state will attempt to help them.

Hazony is president of the Shalem Centre, an institute for Jewish social thought and public policy in Jerusalem and Washington D.C. He is a former adviser to Benjamin Netanyahu and was a member of the Israeli delegation to the Madrid Peace Conference.

Continuity, values, knowledge said goals of Jewish education

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The goals of Torah education are to assure Jewish continuity, inculcate Jewish values and impart knowledge, Rabbi Berel Wein recently told a packed audience at Beth Avraham Yoseph Congregation in Thornhill.

Rabbi Berel Wein

Rabbi Wein, historian, author, educator and now producer of educational television materials, was giving the seventh annual Sam and Sarah Kerzner Memorial Lecture of Eitz Chaim Schools.

Jews in the modern world are facing assimilation, intermarriage and a decreasing birth rate, he charged.

"In 1950, there were six million Jews in North America. That means there should be 20 million now. But statistics from the federations say there are at the most, five million," the rabbi said. "We complain about the Holocaust that killed six million Jews – but what about the Holocaust that caused 15 million to just not be here?"

Education must "bind the generations together," he said, lamenting the vacuum that has arisen between parents, grandparents and children, not only in learning, but in observance as well.

"The goal of education is to teach who we were and where we came from," he said. "It is not only true but fatally dangerous, for instance, to say that everything was perfect in Europe, and that Judaism was destroyed in Israel and North America. The Jewish world fell apart in the shtetl."

The secular Jews in Israel, he said, "didn't come on a ship from Mars." Many don't realize that their great-grandparents were part of the chassidic or yeshiva worlds.

Educators are falling down on the responsibility of teaching "that there is such a thing as the Jewish people, not just people who agree with me or daven with me."

He contrasted the current lack of a feeling that "we are all in this together," with the action of the Brisker Rav, who sent his congregation home on Yom Kippur to get money to ransom two Communist Jews who had been arrested.

The holiness and uniqueness of the land of Israel for Jews, the Jewish ethic that "no end justifies an evil means," and traditional values of solidarity, hope and the ability to laugh at ourselves, are all ideals that are not being passed on, Rabbi Wein said.

"The world is sad," he reflected. "There is no sense of the joy in accomplishment that is part of our value system."

While he acknowledged that "there have never been so many Jews so committed to Torah learning," he noted that the proliferation of so many different institutions of learning is leading to even more disunity and disharmony among the Orthodox.

Rabbi Wein stressed the need to follow the Talmudic dictum to "educate each child according to his way," in other words, in the best way suitable for that individual child.

"What do you do," he asked, "with the child who can't sit for six to eight hours and study Talmud?"

Dealing with questions like that, he said, will inevitably have an impact on how Orthodox Jews relate to those who don't study Torah at all.

A passage in Proverbs tells us that if we educate a child according to his unique needs, "when he grows old he won't leave the path of Torah," Rabbi Wein said.

Tehillim were recited for the 13 Iranians being tried for spying for Israel, and for Harry Korolnek, son of Itche Meyer Korolnek, founder of Eitz Chaim, who is very ill.

Eitz Chaim students Abigail Jesian and Shlomo Nauman gave divrei Torah.

Zundel's appeals rejected by Federal Court exposed Jews to hatred or contempt.

The four-year-old case was initiated by Holocaust survivor Sabina Citron. Others to have joined the case include the Toronto mayor's committee on community and race relations, the Attorney General of Canada, the Canadian Human Rights Commission, the Canadian Holocaust Remembrance Association, the Simon Wiesenthal Centre, Canadian Jewish Congress and the League for Human Rights of B'nai Brith Canada. The Canadian Association for Free Expression, an organization associated with ex-teacher Paul Fromm, has intervened on Zundel's side.

Writing for the appeal court, Judge J. Edgar Sexton ruled that Zundel could not ask for judicial reviews of tribunal rulings while the case was still being heard.

"The unnecessary delays and expenses associated with such appeals can bring the administration of justice into disrepute," Sexton wrote. Furthermore, giving one party the right to appeal every adverse ruling "would, in effect, be a right vested in such a party to frustrate the work of the tribunal."

The court also rejected Zundel's contention that one member of the tribunal, Reva Devins, could reasonably be believed to be biased against him. Zundel based that contention on a 1988 news release issued by the Ontario Human Rights Commission (OHRC). Devins was a member of the OHRC at the time. In a press statement, the OHRC applauded Zundel's Criminal Code conviction for publishing lies about the Holocaust.

The court also noted that statements of the kind made by the OHRC can be justifiable. Zundel's criminal conviction was eventually overturned by the Supreme Court of Canada on constitutional grounds, but not before Judge Beverley McLachlin referred to Zundel's beliefs as offensive. Judges "Cory and Iacobucci described [Zundel's] pamphlet as part of a 'genre of anti-Semitic literature' that 'makes numerous false allegations of fact.'

"In light of these statements, how could it not be objectively justifiable for the OHRC to have made similar statements regarding the same pamphlet in their press release?" the Federal Court asked.

The Simon Wiesenthal Centre applauded the appeal court's decision.

Congress spokesperson Bernie Farber said, "All Zundel's motions have done is draw out the hearing."

Zundel has 30 days to launch an appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada.

for a politically motivated charge at the International Criminal Court."

CJC's proposed amendment requests that Bill C-19 incorporate the wording from the existing extradition treaty between Canada and the United States. In that treaty, politically motivated extraditions are excluded.

Congress welcomed the sections of the legislation that will remove the obstacles the Supreme Court of Canada placed in the path of domestic criminal prosecutions of suspected war criminals in its 1994 decision in the case of Imre Finta, a former Hungarian gendarmerie officer.

Finta's acquittal was upheld after the Supreme Court allowed several defences, including that of following superior orders.

"Members of the committee received the CJC brief with interest," said Eric Vernon, director of government relations for CJC, "and indicated that it made a positive contribution. The committee will now go on to review the recommended amendment and return the bill to the House of Commons."

Israel's UN isolation ends

It will only be allowed to sit on committees at the UN's New York headquarters, excluding it from discussions and consultations at other UN offices in Geneva, Nairobi, Rome and Vienna. Israel is also barred from nominating candidates to UN posts for two years.

Officially, Israel's membership in WEOG is temporary, although it's renewable every four years. The Jewish state, however, must keep applying to join the Asian Group.

Canada has long crusaded for Israel's membership in WEOG. Foreign Affairs Minister Lloyd Axworthy, in a meeting with Canadian Jewish leader in early 1997, said Canada would try to facilitate Israel's inclusion in the group.

But in a puzzling development a few months later, Axworthy said he would advise Israel to "forget it" because WEOG is dominated by the European Union, which makes decisions en bloc.

Axworthy told leaders on the 1997 UJA Fly-In to Ottawa that while he supported Israel's membership in WEOG in theory, he doubted the "utility" of the group in practical terms.

But at the CIC's annual policy conference in March, Axworthy repeated Canada's commitment to Israel's inclusion in WEOG.

David Goldberg, the CIC's director of research, said the principle that drove Axworthy's support for Israel's inclusion in WEOG never really waned.

"He has lived up to his commitment," Goldberg said.

Goldberg told The CJN that Israel's recent withdrawal from Lebanon may have been a contributing factor in its inclusion.

Israel had been inching toward membership in WEOG since the 1993 Oslo peace accords. Progress was slowed following the assassination of Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin, and the Europeans especially were seen as loath to reward his successor, Benjamin Netanyahu, who was perceived as too intransigent in the peace process.

Soon after his election in 1997, UN Secretary General Kofi Annan revived the issue, saying that "this anomaly should be corrected." Goldberg also praised Canada, especially its envoy to the UN, Robert Fowler, for helping to move the issue along.

He stressed that the significance of Israel's membership in WEOG far outweighs the stipulations imposed.

Goldberg said he hopes Canada will continue to push for complete normalization of relations with Israel at the UN.

Jewish journalists urged not to hide their religion

By ADAM SEGAL
CJN Intern

TORONTO — Jewish journalists should not be afraid of incorporating Jewish sensibilities into their reporting – even on Israel, said filmmaker Simcha Jacobovici at a recent student journalism conference.

Speaking to a room full of aspiring journalists at Afterword's Second Annual National Media Conference For Young Jewish Adults, Jacobovici, an Orthodox Jew, said many Jewish journalists make the mistake of trying to hide their Jewishness for fear of being labelled as biased reporters.

"Jews tend to self-censor, and keep the [professional and religious] worlds apart," he said. "I have a problem with this.

"I never hide the fact that I'm an Orthodox Jew. I just try to tell the story honestly and intelligently," he said.

Jacobovici, who has won two Emmy's and five Gemini's for his films, said he has never suffered professionally for being openly Jewish, even when interviewing Islamic fundamentalists for the film Deadly Currents (1993).

"I bring a Jewish sensibility to all of my films," he said. "[But] when I make film on a Jewish topic, I try to make it so everyone will say 'wow, that's interesting.'"

Jeremy Costin, a conference participant from Vancouver, said Jacobovici's talk drove home the importance of journalists being deeply rooted in their beliefs. If "you're aware of your convictions and biases and you're confident enough in [them], then you will go out of the way to be objective," Costin said.

But not everyone at the conference agreed that journalists should bring Judaism or any other religion into their work. "The workplace is not the place for your personal religious beliefs to be aired to everyone," said Marci Surkes, a participant from Montreal.

Jacobovici conceded the journalism field has not always welcomed public displays of Judaism. He recalled that several years ago, a friend of his at the CBC requested he be allowed to wear a yarmulke during a broadcast and "he got a very weird response."

But Jacobovici noted times have changed. He recently appeared on the CBC and Arts and Entertainment (A & E) wearing a yarmulke while narrating his film Quest For The Lost Tribes and said the head covering was warmly received by audiences.

20 students receive TD Canada Trust scholarships

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Emily Pearlman is one student who won't have to worry about student loans when she heads off to university in the fall.

Pearlman was recently awarded the TD Canada Trust Scholarship valued at over $50,000.00.

The scholarship, awarded for outstanding community leadership, is the largest scholarship program of its kind in Canada, providing each winner with full tuition at any Canadian college or university, $3,500 a year toward living expenses, and a guaranteed offer of summer employment for up to four years.

This year, 20 young people from across Canada were chosen from among 2,700 applicants, based primarily on their outstanding community leadership.

"Each of these remarkable young Canadians have made a positive impact in their communities, and our country as a whole," said Edmund Clark, chair and CEO, TD Canada Trust, in announcing this year's recipients.

Pearlman, a student at Lisgar Collegiate Institute, founded Youth Infringement, a student-run theatrical festival that encourages youth to explore their creativity in the dramatic arts in such areas as script writing, acting, producing, lighting and directing.

After securing a $4,000 grant from the Community Foundation of Ottawa-Carleton last year, to help with start-up costs such as venue space and rental equipment, Youth Infringement had a successful inaugural season, and has just completed its second season with a three-night, nine-play schedule.

Winning the scholarship has been exciting for Pearlman, she said. The first round of applicants was narrowed down to 80 finalists who were flown to Toronto for personal interviews.

"It was an amazing group of people from all across Canada. Everyone was so enamoured by what the others had done," she said.

Jane Kilburn, manager, sponsorships, corporate and public affairs at TD Bank Financial Group said, "[Meeting the students] for me, is the most fulfilling part. You read their bios, you hear about them, and speak to them over the telephone, but meeting them is inspiring...It really makes you feel very humble to see what these young people have done in a few short years."

Pearlman plans to attend Concordia University in the fall, in the theatre performance program. She won't be taking advantage of the summer employment offer for this summer, however. "I have been saving for a trip since I was 12 years old, and I will be going to Egypt, Israel and Greece for the summer."

Tribute to Israel

On this page we publish snapshots of various "Israeli" moments this past year, each of which, in its own unique way, offers a tribute to that tiny, often frustrating, but remarkable country. Seen are (clockwise from top right) Prime Minister Jean Chrétien and Aline Chrétien during their visit to Jerusalem; an Israeli aid worker assisting some of the famine-starved people in Ethiopia; Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Barak last month at Ben-Gurion airport greeting the one millionth immigrant to arrive from the former Soviet Union; Israeli troops pulling out of Lebanon; Canadian youth activist Craig Kielburger shmoozing with a group of students in Beersheva; and a trio of young Canadians on the Birthright Israel program displaying their emotions as they stepped off the plane.

Israelis accepting of Ethiopian immigrants: survey

BY AVI MACHLIS
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

Israelis have a generally positive view of Ethiopian immigrants to Israel, but they are divided over whether to allow a mass immigration of 26,000 Falash Mura, according to a new poll.

The poll, commissioned by the International Fellowship of Christians and Jews, was released last week in Jerusalem, as the organization announced a commitment of between $3 million and $5 million (US) over the next two years to help finance the absorption of Ethiopian immigrants.

Rabbi Yechiel Eckstein, president of the fellowship, said findings showing Israelis are very accepting of Ethiopian immigrants indicate that the difficult absorption process can be improved.

"If we combine the positive views with greater financial allocation to help in areas of job training, placement and education, the immigrants here will indeed reach the same level one generation from now that others have," he said.

But Rabbi Eckstein also warned against an "explosion" in Israeli society if the present "five to 10-year window of opportunity" aimed at the integration of immigrants is not employed.

One day before the poll was released, the Jewish Agency for Israel flew 100 Falash Mura from Ethiopia to Israel.

The group was the first to arrive since Interior Minister Natan Sharansky visited Ethiopia last month to assess the situation of the thousands of Falash Mura – Ethiopians whose ancestors converted from Judaism to Christianity – who have gathered in transit camps hoping to immigrate to the Jewish state.

Rabbi Yechiel Eckstein

In a related development, the Israeli government and the Jewish Agency announced the allocation of about $240,000 for extra staff people to absorb some 5,000 to 6,000 additional Ethiopian immigrants.

According to the poll, 49 percent of Israelis said Israel has behaved "adequately" in absorbing the Ethiopian Jews, and another nine percent said the country has done an "exceptionally good" job.

The remainder of the responses ranged from "minimally acceptable" to "exceptionally badly."

Nevertheless, responses to several questions indicated that a strong majority view the immigration of Ethiopians as a great success, and 63 percent said they consider it a net gain for Israel.

Only 29 percent considered the immigrants a burden on the economy.

Other responses contradicted complaints of racism often voiced by the Ethiopians.

An overwhelming 89 percent said they would be happy to be treated by an Ethiopian doctor, and 95 percent said they would not mind having their child serve under an Ethiopian officer in the army.

Natan Sharansky

One question touched on the issue of marriage.

Of those polled, 71 percent would consider it "a problem" for their children or grandchildren to date or marry an Ethiopian.

"It's very similar to the Sephardi experience that happened here," said Rabbi Eckstein. "Part of the poll also indicated that most Israelis don't know [any Ethiopians] or have Ethiopian friends. I believe that as integration increases and there are more friendships, that number will increase."

Those polled showed far less acceptance of Russian immigrants.

When asked who, if they were acting as an employer, would be their first choice between three equally qualified candidates for a job, only three percent said a Russian, while 38 percent chose a sabra – a native-born Israeli– and 22 percent chose an Ethiopian.

On the Falash Mura issue, 35 percent said they supported accepting the 26,000 Ethiopians waiting for approval to come to Israel as citizens. Another 18 percent preferred granting entry to a limited group, while 26 percent rejected the Falash Mura completely and 21 percent had no opinion.

Israelis are also divided over the ongoing debate on whether to change the Law of Return, which grants immediate citizenship to anyone who had a Jewish parent or grandparent.

While 39 percent said the law should not be changed, 41 percent said it should be more restrictive.

High-tech takes root in Jerusalem

By SHIMON BEN NOACH
WZPS

Now that major international companies like Intel, Digital, News DataCom (part of Rupert Murdoch's global empire) and local firms such as Eva Pharmaceuticals have established major facilities in Israel, high-tech has emerged as one of Jerusalem's principal industrial sectors.

In fact, with dozens of high-tech start-ups rapidly developing market-oriented, value-added export products, high-tech looks set to overtake tourism as Jerusalem's number 1 foreign currency earner.

"High-tech is ideal for our city," says Jerusalem Mayor Ehud Olmert. "We have a highly educated work force looking for new challenges. In addition, high-tech industries are not polluting and in the limited space that we have for industrial development, high-tech can offer the greatest returns."

Ehud Tokatly, a seventh generation Jerusalemite, is typical of a new generation of entrepreneurs hoping to hit the big time with high-tech products. Vice-president of MovieStar Systems Ltd., Tokatly is a former script writer for Israel television. Several years ago, he teamed up with American immigrant Michael Jaffe, a former film producer with Israel TV and MovieStar System's CEO.

"We have developed software for moviemakers," explains Tokatly. "At the moment, film producers, even with multi-million-dollar budgets, must sit down with pen and paper and work out budgets, timetables and the dozens of other logistical factors involved in making a movie. At best they might use a simple Word program. This is the first software worldwide that will facilitate movie making."

MovieStar Systems is located on the Har Hotzvim Science Based Industrial Park near the western entrance to the city, where it recently graduated from the high-tech Har Hotzvim — Technology Entrepreneurship Centre — one of four technological incubators in Jerusalem.

Three of the Jerusalem incubators — PATIR R&D Ltd., the Jerusalem Software Incubator Ltd., and Hitecx Har Hotzvim — are part of a nationwide network of 26 technological incubators set up by the Office of the Chief Scientist (OCS) of the Ministry of Industry and Trade. The fourth incubator, also located at Har Hotzvim, is privately owned by local industry.

"Israel has the second highest number of start-up companies in the world after the U.S. in absolute terms," observes Dr. Orna Berry, the Chief Scientist of the Ministry of Industry and Trade, whose office is in downtown Jerusalem.

According to minister of industry and trade, Natan Sharansky, Israel, remarkably, has more high-tech start-ups than all of the western European nations put together. So far, more than 400 start-up companies have graduated from the country's incubators, attracting over $130 million (all figures US dollars) in investments and reflecting a success rate of 51 percent. Over 10 percent of these start-ups are located in Jerusalem.

The criterion for success is the ability to attract investors. MovieStar Systems, for example, is currently negotiating with a major U.S. investor in Hollywood. This would not only supply the company with the capital needed to finalize development of the product, but also provide a strategic partner closest to the company's largest potential market in California.

MovieStar has received significant sums of seed money from the OCS, while the incubator provided know-how, advice and logistical support, which helped the fledgling company get off the ground. The incubators in Jerusalem have been especially well positioned to help those newcomers from the former Soviet Union who reach Israel with innovative ideas and entrepreneurial ambitions.

'The ability to attract investors'

New immigrants have complemented the country's traditional strengths in software, communications, medical electronics and biotechnology by introducing innovative materials and new industrial processes.

ELAM Electroluminescent Industries, based at Har Hotzvim, was started in 1992 by micro-electronic engineers Moshe Voskoboinok and Israel Baumberg, both new Russian immigrants at the time. Initially located at the PATIR incubator based on the campus of the Jerusalem College of Technology — Machon Lev, ELAM has made a revolutionary breakthrough in electroluminescent light technology. With annual sales of more than $3 million, ELAM produces thick transparent wire that is luminescent and can be used in tunnels, for clothing and signs, and has broad consumer and industrial applications in the transportation, entertainment, textile and defence sectors.

"The people in the incubator believed in us," recalls Voskoboinok, "and that gave us the confidence to develop a viable product."

Indeed it is this infrastructure of college, research institutes, incubators and high-tech industrial parks that has enabled Jerusalem to take full advantage of Israel's high-tech revolution.

Har Hotzvim covers an area of 37 acres with 120,000 square metres of high-tech buildings and an additional 45,000 square metres under construction. More than 5,000 people, most of them professionals and academics, work in Har Hotzvim.

The attractive Malcha Technological Park in south-west Jerusalem, still under development, is occupied by numerous high-tech enterprises. [WZPS photo]

New industries offer hope for city's economic salvation

Furthermore, the Malcha Technological Park in the south-west of the city comprises three buildings and has an additional four buildings planned. A significant amount of space in the capital's other industrial zones in Talpiot, Givat Shaul and Atarot, is also occupied by high-tech enterprises.

An added incentive to setting up a high-tech enterprise in Jerusalem is that the city enjoys Development Area A status. This entitles tenants to government incentives, including grants of 24 percent or 10 years tax exemption.

Yet despite these high-tech perks and the vast opportunities they provide for all the science graduates and new immigrants in Jerusalem, some commute to the coast, while others leave the city altogether.

There are 28,000 full-time students at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem alone and an additional 14,000 studying there in continuing education. Some 3,500 scientific research projects are currently in progress and 800 new projects are begun each year at the University's science campus on Givat Ram and the Hebrew University — Hadassah medical campus at Ein Kerem.

The Hebrew University's know-how and intellectual property are developed by the Yissum Research Development Company. Mordechai Perlmutter, CEO of Yissum reports that he regularly has America's foremost business corporations visiting him as Israel's reputation for high-tech innovation spreads.

Last year alone Yissum signed 130 contracts, 50 percent of them with companies overseas, earning Yissum $12 million. Yissum has also been a partner in start-ups such as Perio Products, founded by researchers from the Hebrew University's Faculties of Pharmacology and Dental Medicine who developed a tiny, biodegradable chip that treats gum disease. The chip, which can be used by dentists, slowly releases the drug chlorhexidine to treat inflamed and infected gums. Perio Products has since been acquired by Israel Chemicals Ltd.

Some Jerusalem start-ups have needed neither incubator nor university to nurture them. Gamda-Cell Ltd. was established in 1998 by Dr. Avi Treves. Located in Givat Shaul, Gamda-Cell is a medical biotechnology start-up owned by Gamida for Life Group, Biomedical Investment Ltd. and the Pamot Venture Capital Fund.

"We are executing joint R&D programs with Hadassah," explains Treves, an experienced scientist in cell therapy and immunology, "and hope to develop technologies and products for ex-vivo expansion and manipulation of cells for clinical applications."

Other promising Jerusalem start-ups include: Catalytic Systems Technologies Ltd., which has developed novel environmentally friendly heaters and boilers based on catalytic combustion; BATEC Ltd. which is developing proprietary diagnostic kits for food colouring and DNA extraction; JPB Technologies Ltd., which develops and produces electronic ballast for street lamps; and Driver Safety Systems Ltd., which has developed electro-optical equipment and applied software for automatic traffic law enforcement.

Last year nearly 80 percent of the $18 billion worth of industrial goods that Israel exported had high-tech components. With the "brain drain" still plaguing Jerusalem, high-tech offers new hope for the city's economic salvation.

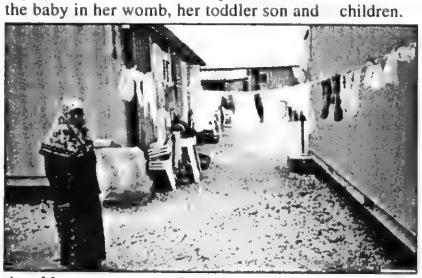
Community for quake victims has a solid design

By ESTHER HECHT
Special to The CJN

The temporary housing Israel provided for some of Turkey's earthquake victims was designed to restore community life. Five months after the Israel Village was inaugurated, new neighbours are helping each other, children have made new friends and an engagement party is in progress.

Sefanur Aydin was one of the lucky ones. It was the dead of night on Aug. 17, 1999, when a violent earthquake devastated her home in Adapazari, Turkey, 150 kilometres southeast of Istanbul.

The quake that killed thousands, including Aydin's brother-in-law, spared her and the baby in her womb, her toddler son and her husband. But their home and all their possessions were gone and a brutal winter lay ahead.



An old woman approaches a laundry line on the way to her courtyard in the Israel Village.

Then Aydin won the lottery. Hers was one of 312 families who won the draw for housing in an Israeli-built complex on the outskirts of Adapazari that has come to be known as the Israel Village. And it was here, just after Aydin moved into her new home in October, that her daughter was born.

Since then, Aydin has measured her good fortune in neighbourly terms. "In the beginning we shared everything" she says. "It's amazing how the neighbours help."

The quake that destroyed Aydin's home and a second, more powerful, tremor three months later left 16,016 people dead, about 30,000 wounded and 400,000 homeless, according to Col. Benny Cohen, Israel's defence attaché in Turkey. Some 120,000 people have spent this, the harshest winter in 10 years, in government-provided tents.

Some did not even get tents. In Izmit and Adapazari, the cities hardest hit by the quakes, survivors have sought shelter in shanties made of plastic sheeting, tin and other scavenged materials.

Fethi Sen (pronounced Shen), 66, a former bookkeeper, was thrilled to move to the Israel Village from a tent camp.

"When we got the keys we were as happy as a five-year-old with candy," Sen says.

At first, relatives crowded in with his family so that 15 people were living in the 30-square-meter [about 270 square feet] flat. Eventually the relatives found housing elsewhere, leaving just Sen, his wife, and four children.

Pakinur Aka, 39, punctuates nearly every sentence with "Thank God." She shares her new home with her parents-in-law, her husband and two adolescent sons, and everything, thank God, is very good, she says, even the shower.

In August, her mother-in-law, Fatma Aka, 68, was trapped for six hours in the rubble of her home and suffered a leg injury. After her rescue, she was treated at the Israeli field hospital.

"If not for the Israeli hospital her leg would have been amputated," Pakinur Aka says. "We keep saying, 'Thank God.'"

When Israel decided to go beyond its rescue efforts and medical treatment and help provide temporary housing to Turkey's quake victims, time was of the essence. The target date was Oct. 25 – about two months after the first quake.

The Defence Ministry called in Shalom Kelner, 62, a U.S.-trained architect, to design the community. Every detail was discussed with Turkish government officials, whom Kelner and ministry representatives met to find out more about their needs and local customs.

"We knew we had to build a Turkish village, not an Israeli village," says Abraham Haber, head of the ministry's construction department.

The Polish-born Kelner knew from his own five-year experience as a new immigrant in a tent camp in Israel that "temporary" housing might have to serve for years. That knowledge strengthened his resolve to build it in a way that would foster a return to normal communal life. That meant arranging the housing units around courtyards, rather than in rows, to create spaces where new friendships could grow and children could play safely.

Sefanur Aydin (far left) shares a cup of tea on the steps of her neighbour's home.

He also planned a 10-room school for the 330 children, a clinic, playgrounds and parking areas.

The housing units were to be prepared in Israel, so they had to be strong enough to withstand shipping. Kelner chose used marine shipping containers as his basic building blocks.

Each housing unit is built of two containers joined lengthwise. Besides the two bedrooms, there is a bathroom with a toilet and shower and a multipurpose space with a kitchenette and dining area. Each unit costs $15,000.

Kelner also decided to paint the houses bright colours, taking his cue from local architecture. The colours turned out to be a boon in more ways than one. They enabled the construction companies involved to identify their containers upon arrival in Turkey. They also help the residents find their way around the project.

When asked where her home is, 13-year-old Ayse Demir responds in what seems to be her only word in English, "yellow."

Despite the record speed with which the project was completed, it was anything but a smooth operation. The Defence Ministry's Victor Bar-Gil, who headed the Israeli team, ran interference at every level.

The Israeli government put up 19 million shekels toward the village. More than four million shekels came from the Israeli public and from organizations, including the American Jewish Committee and the Joint Distribution Committee; Kibbutz Artzi donated playground equipment. The Turkish government provided the infrastructure.

The Israel Village was the first such project completed by a foreign country. The opening ceremony on Oct. 25 was attended by Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Barak and Turkish Prime Minister Bulent Ecevit.

Israel's rescue efforts, medical treatment of quake victims and the Israel Village made front page news in Turkey.

The weather is unexpectedly mild on the day in mid-March that Kelner and I visit the project. We find Sefanur Aydin sitting on the steps of a neighbour's home sharing a sociable cup of tea with two of her new friends.

In the school, and in some of the houses, white curtains add a homey touch. Wooden lean-tos have sprouted on some of the homes, as have outdoor shelves and TV antennas.

On a small table near Ayse Demir's front door a tiny plant has opened its red blooms to the faint spring sun. Meanwhile, an outdoor engagement party is getting under way. At last the couple arrives, the young man in a black suit and his fiancée in a maroon velvet and lace gown, her hair done in elaborate ringlets.

A girl stands on the steps outside her home in the Israel Village. The housing units were raised on concrete stilts to avoid flooding.

The engagement party, the curtains and the flowering plant are all signs that the residents of the Israel Village are looking to the future.

But the quake has left a legacy of grief, anxiety and tension. The tremors that destroyed homes also brought factories and shops crashing down, taking with them the livelihood of most of the residents.

Many of the men, uneasy with the forced idleness, have taken to binge drinking, according to Funda Gapoglu (pronounced Chap-Ollu), 25, former representative of the area's governor. And that has led to domestic violence, she says.

Many people now call Israel Village home

Student volunteers from a nearby university have asked the children to model in clay the bodies of their friends and loved ones and the graves in which they were buried.

One of the graves is marked "my grandfather," another "my grandmother."

Seated in front of their models, the youngsters describe the earthquake in oddly matter-of-fact tones.

Hazel Aydin, 10, had moved into a new home just two days before the quake. "The walls fell on each other," she recounts. "I got out by myself. A piece of concrete fell on my mother."

Hande Bahcivangil, 10, remembers going with her father to her aunt's house. "No one came out of the ruins. We had no hope. On the third day they brought out the body of my uncle. They took my aunt to the hospital."

The children say they have made new friends and that they feel good in their new school. But when asked what it was like to start life anew here, Emine Ozen, 10, bursts into tears and buries her face in her hands as she answers, "This house is no substitute for my real home. I miss my home very much."

Tears roll down the cheeks of Emine's 12-year-old brother, Yigit, as he says, "In my dreams I see my [old] home."

According to Benny Cohen, 50 of the children need professional help, but getting it required busing them to another town, so the therapy had to wait until the Joint Distribution Committee offered funds for the bus trip.

The quake has created other problems. Sefanur Aydin had no clothing or equipment for her newborn baby, and essentials like diapers and laundry detergent are often in short supply.

Yet, we hear nothing but gratitude. For its residents, the Israel Village is now home. Sefanur Aydin is not sure where she will be five years from now, but she could see herself here.

Fethi Sen has a clearer view. "Probably the young people can't adjust easily," he says. "[But] if someone tells me I have to live here forever, I can live with that."

Tribute to Israel

Israel owes nothing to its detractors

By PAUL MICHAELS
Special to The CJN

"It has become evident that no external factor can induce anti-Semitism in the anti-Semite."

Jean-Paul Sartre wrote those words just after World War II, after the Holocaust. I wondered, upon reading John Lloyd's op-ed column, "Slaying the ghosts of Jewry's past," in The Globe and Mail (April 24), how Sartre would have reacted to Lloyd's piece.

Guest Voice

In the immediate aftermath of Deborah Lipstadt's courtroom victory over David Irving, Lloyd uses the first part of his article to denounce anti-Semitism. He then segues to a skewed consideration of Israel's democracy, including its failure to provide full equality for its Arab citizens. Pointing out the imperfections of the Israeli state, he implies that Israel, as a Zionist (Jewish) state, is incompatible with democracy.

Here is Lloyd's concluding paragraph in full: "Israel's need is to supersede its Zionist destiny by transforming it from an ethnic and religious cause into a democratic one. This action would deprive the anti-Semites of part of their platform – that part which feeds its monstrous vision with observation of the real breaches of human rights committed by the Israeli state. In doing this, Israel begins to slay the ghosts of Jewry's most tragic century."

Lloyd's words unmistakably imply that Israel as a Jewish state is a cause of current anti-Semitism. This is a modern, political variation on the age-old theme of blame the Jews for anti-Semitism (e.g., "If only you Jews were not like this or that, the rest of society would be more tolerant of you").

'The anti-Semite will grasp at any rationale'

But Lloyd's thesis is paradoxical, to say the least, in light of his earlier denunciation of anti-Semitism and anti-Semites. When Lloyd observes that anti-Semites today, "feed off behaviour by the state of Israel itself," he is confusing the issue. For only some anti-Semites focus on Israel; many anti-Semites never do. But for those who consider Israel, one of their favourite devices is to delegitimize Israel as a Jewish state by, among other things, making the very claim that Lloyd uses in his own concluding paragraph.

Lloyd may not have meant to be participating in the vile phenomenon he explicitly denounces, and indeed in conversation insisted that no "reasonable" person could possibly infer anything anti-Semitic from his remarks. To this I would reply that strictly on the basis of what Lloyd has written, any reasonable person would have considerable difficulty avoiding that very conclusion.

Israel, like all democracies, should work to strengthen its democratic institutions and to protect its minorities, not only because these are admirable goals in their own right, but also because Israel owes it to itself as a decent society as enunciated in its founding declaration. While equality for all its citizens is enshrined in its foundation, Israel, along with all other democracies, has imperfections in its practice. But in no way does Israel owe anything to its habitual detractors, anti-Semites foremost among them. To argue that it does as a means of disarming them, as Lloyd argues, is preposterous.

Lloyd believes that if Israel were to become more virtuous, this would diminish the anti-Semites' arsenal. One could more readily argue just the opposite: that Israel's perfectibility would elicit even greater anti-Semitism since, historically speaking, the resentment at Jewish "over-achievement" has often been at the root of anti-Jewish sentiment and violence.

From time to time we encounter persistent attempts, some blatantly obvious, some cleverly subtle, to delegitimize Israel as a Jewish state. For these detractors of Israel, the national liberation struggle of any people is worthy of support – except in the case of the Jewish people. Other democracies have imperfections in their treatment of ethnic minorities and in their human rights record. Examples abound. Yet I do not know of a single case other than Israel where the very foundation of the state itself gets put in question as a result. Why the double standard?

This brings us back to what was so evident to Sartre in 1946 but completely incomprehensible to Lloyd more than half a century later: "No external factor can induce anti-Semitism in the anti-Semite." The anti-Semite will grasp at any rationale to justify his anti-Semitism since his hatred of Jews is very much the irrational "passion" Sartre describes. That Israel just happens to have been, since 1948, another convenient target for such hatred imposes no obligation whatsoever upon Israel to live up to a higher standard. The rub for the anti-Semite is not Israel's behaviour, good or bad; it is Israel's very existence as a Jewish state.

From Belgrade to Jerusalem; building a new life in Israel

By SIMON GRIVER
WZPS

When Goran Alkalai was told last April in Belgrade that he could leave ahead of the NATO airstrikes on Yugoslavia with just two suitcases, he elected to take his guitar instead of one of the suitcases.

Alkalai, 24, never returned and today, more than a year later, he is studying for a master's degree in classical guitar, as well as teaching undergraduate students at the Rubin Academy of Music in Jerusalem.

Alkalai said he first visted Israel nearly three years ago on a World Union of Jewish Students (WUJS) seminar. "I liked the country then, but I didn't plan to make aliyah," he said.

"Then during a pilot tour that the Jewish Agency arranged for us during April and May '99, I really got to see Israel. I fell in love with the country and the people, and I really feel that this is my own country.

"In particular I was enchanted by Jerusalem," he added. "I decided that if I was going to stay, then there was only one place in Israel that I wanted to live. I am not an Orthodox person, but the city definitely has something special spiritually. It inspires me to play even more music."

The Kosovo crisis in April also gave Orna Rosenfeld (née Svetlana Rudicvranic) the final push that she needed in order to immigrate to Israel.

"Since coming to Israel I have taken on my mother's Jewish name," she explained, "which is something I have always wanted to do. My father is half Croatian and half Hungarian, but I have always felt closest to my Jewish roots."

Rosenfeld, 25, was an integral part of the small Jewish community in the northern Yugoslav town of Subotica where she was born and grew up, and in Belgrade, where she studied architecture at Belgrade University. She was active in Jewish heritage matters — documenting Jewish synagogues in Yugoslavia for the Hebrew University's Centre of Jewish Art in Jerusalem, among other projects. She recently undertook a Jewish Agency speaking tour of the United States, addressing United Jewish Communities (UJC).

"I always planned to emigrate to Israel," she explained. "But I was always postponing it. First I wanted to come when I had completed school. Then I put it off until after university. The Kosovo crisis gave me the necessary push to really do it."

Rosenfeld described herself as being in love with Israel, citing the special energy of the people and the delightful architecture of Jersualem as some of the irresistible attractions of the country. She has completed four years of study at the University of Belgrade, and after improving her Hebrew at the East Talpiot Absorption Centre ulpan, she was accepted to continue her degree at the Technion, Israel Institute of Technology in Haifa.

The Technion is considered the best school of architecture in Israel and Rosenfeld did not want to compromise on academic standards. So, regrettably, she has temporarily left Jerusalem but plans returning after she graduates next year.

Olga Israel, 21, is already fluent in Hebrew, having spent a year at a Youth Aliyah school in Jerusaslem when she was 13. "At that time I phoned home to my parents to tell them I was making aliyah," she recalls. "They acted very wisely. They said, 'Fine, come home and have a summer vacation and then you will be able to go back.' Of course, they pampered me all summer and I never made it back to Israel."

But she always stayed in love with Israel and especially Jerusalem. "The city has an exotic, romantic and very spiritual atmosphere and we have a historic and emotional bond with it," she said.

An economics student at Belgrade University, Israel will continue her studies next year. This year she is working for the Jewish Agency's Tnuat Aliyah, co-ordinating all matters related to Yugoslavian Jewry. She has also just returned from a speaking tour of UJC federations in the United States.

"But while we are so much at home here," she said, "it is still very difficult for us. Resettling as an immigrant is like trying to learn to walk again. Being here without our parents to help us is very difficult. But it is worth the effort."

The three new immigrants prefer not to discuss the situation back in Belgrade. Even though, and perhaps because, the Kosovo crisis has been resolved through a NATO imposed solution in favour of the Albanian minority at the expense of the Serbs, nationalism is very intense in Belgrade. They fear that their parents will be considered traitors because their children have emigrated.

But all the Yugoslavian immigrants insist that they would have emigrated anyway — drawn by Jerusalem and the strength of their Jewish heritage.

A group of young adults at Kiryat Moriah in Jerusalem – some of the 350 Yugoslavian Jews brought to Israel by the Jewish Agency during the Kosovo crisis last year.

The old lady of no. 1 Ben – Maimon Street

By ADINA ESHEL
Special to The CJN

Memoir

It was about noon on a rainy day in January. The drizzle had not stopped for a moment. I was sitting in my office, at the Central Zionist Archives in Jerusalem, then still on Ibn-Gavirol Street, absorbed in my work. I did not expect any visitors and I was enjoying the opportunity of working undisturbed.

Suddenly the door opened, and a little old lady was standing on the threshold. Upon seeing me she seemed surprised and stopped.

"Where is Rachel Ever-Hadani?" she asked in a rather demanding tone.

"She retired two months ago," I replied.

The old lady hesitated for a moment, then made up her mind and entered, closing the door behind her.

"Not another grumpy old woman!" I thought.

She was very small, one would say petite, but there was something about her expression that gave an impression of strength. She was wearing a grey suit, a small grey hat and a string of black pearls. She also wore light makeup.

While she was approaching my table, I noticed that she was using her umbrella for a walking stick, and her legs were supported by thick leather straps. When seated she unfastened the straps, which were obviously troubling her.

"These blasted things are supposed to help me, but if you ask me they only disturb me," she said dryly.

She straightened herself up and examined me with a serious, direct look. "Have you inherited Miss Ever-Hadani's job?"

"Yes," I replied.

"And did you catch up with everything you ought to know?" she added.

"I hope so," I replied cautiously.

"My name is Lea Weitz-Cohen. Does it mean anything to you?"

"I must confess it does not," I answered.

"So I assumed, but my name is of no importance; you keep here some of my father's and my husband's papers, and you people say they are important, so I have brought some more."

Her voice was young and strong, she spoke clearly and with no accent. While speaking she continued to examine me.

"I shall be pleased to see the papers," I said.

"Among many other documents, dating back to the turn of the century, I also have papers regarding the Jewish Colonization Association. Miss Ever-Hadani was familiar with it, her father had written a book about JCA, and she was quite fluent in French. Do you read French?" she asked.

"Not in handwriting," I replied, knowing I was losing marks.

"So how do you deal with the papers?" she asked, partly in wonder, partly with contempt and without waiting for my reply, she went on asking: "Are you a Jerusalemite?"

"Yes, I live here."

"But were you born here?"

"I was born in Tel Aviv," I replied.

"And where have you studied?"

"At the Herzlia Gymnasium," I said.

A broad smile lit the old lady's face and the next inevitable question followed: "What graduating class?"

"Number 39," I replied.

"Pleased to meet you," she said, taking my hand. "I am a graduate of the second graduating class of the gymnasium, and that makes me 37 years your senior. Now make out quickly how old I am," she demanded and an impish smile danced in her blue eyes. The ice broke.

"I am a relic from the last century. In April I shall be 85," she said

I did not know what to say. "You don't look 85," I replied. Although my comment was true, it seemed to be a worn out cliche and this lady was not fishing for compliments. I kept quiet.

She began fumbling with her briefcase and took a bunch of handwritten letters.

'The beginning of a wonderful friendship'

"Pity you can't read this handwriting," she said. "You would have enjoyed every word. It is Ahron Ahronson's handwriting in French. Does this name mean anything to you?" she asked.

"Something," I teased her.

She smiled. "I assume you'll find someone to read it to you," she said. "However, I shall be pleased to do it, if you want me to. Not here. At my place, of course. Miss Ever-Hadani used to come to my house for the papers. Are you willing to continue with this arrangement?"

"With great pleasure," I replied.

"Whenever you want to come let me know, and I shall prepare my famous apple and cinnamon cake. I hope you are not on a diet, as I put in lots of sugar." She began fastening her supporting straps, which required quite an effort on her part.

"So, we have an arrangement; and don't forget, I live on No. 1 Ben-Maimon St.," she said, standing up. "Write down my telephone number — 631046." I wrote it down in my phone book and accompanied the old lady out to Ibn-Gavirol Street.

That was the beginning of a wonderful friendship that was to last for 13 years. Her phone number was one of the most important and useful numbers in my phone book and in my memory.

Upon returning to my office, I hastened to look up what the names Weitz and Cohen were supposed to tell me. Weitz was the name of her father. Cohen was the name of her husband. They had died one after the other, her father in 1935, her husband in 1936.

Dr. Naftali Weitz was a doctor in the Jewish settlements of the Galilee, appointed and sent there by Baron Edmond de Rothschild, in 1898. Her mother, Anna, remained in Paris to complete her studies, and arrived in Palestine, with her four-year-old daughter Lea, on Jan. 1, 1900. Her mother was the first woman doctor in Palestine. They had lived at first in Rosh Pina, near Safed, then in Zichron Yaakov and finally in Jerusalem.

Dr. Zvi Eliahu Cohen was a lawyer who also indulged in writing, under the pen-name Talmon. He came to Palestine from South Africa, like many youngsters at the time, to study at the Herzlia Gymnasium, where he met Lea Weitz.

During World War I, the Weitz family was deported from Palestine to Egypt, together with many other Palestinian Jews. In Alexandria, Weitz was among the founders of the Zion Mule Corps that served under the command of Joseph Trumpeldor, with the British forces in Gallipoli, Turkey. The secretary of that corps was Sgt. Eliahu Cohen.

Lea and her mother left Alexandria for Paris, where Lea studied biology. Eventually, Lea met Eliahu Cohen who came to Paris to study law. Upon their graduation they were married and returned to Palestine, then under British rule.

Tribute to Israel

'Her strong sense of justice directed her'

were community minded people, who cared about people and helped them, quite often offering their services free of charge. After their death, Lea was left with three children and no money.

Being fluent in French and Hebrew, she began translating from French into Hebrew and vice versa. Among others, she translated books by André Maurois, with whom she also corresponded, and Guy de Maupassant. She became the first Hebrew announcer on Palestine Radio under British rule, and on the whole, worked hard to support herself and her children.

All along she held papers of utmost historical importance, which she could have sold to eager collectors. That possibility never occurred to her. She kept the papers lovingly till she was in her 80s, and then donated them to the Central Zionist Archives.

Those papers included many unique photographs that told the story of an important chapter in Israel's history, along with the history of her parents and of people she loved; so she passed them on gradually, over a period of 15 years.

Sitting with her and the papers felt like sitting with history itself. Each document she handed over to me was accompanied by its complete story; each name mentioned in a document was given an accurate background, so that a complete picture emerged. She was, in fact, a connecting thread between past and present. She knew people who were dubbed national heroes, like Sara Ahronson and her famous brother Ahron, whose younger sister Rivka was her best friend.

Lea Weitz-Cohen exuded the spirit of Palestine at the beginning of the century. Her furniture, kitchen appliances and dishes belonged to the turn of the century period; partly brought from Paris by her parents, partly handmade by local craftsmen. She did not bother to buy new kitchenware. "What for?" she would say when asked. "They still serve me perfectly well."

Her intelligence and astonishing memory, combined with a sharp tongue in perfect Hebrew, as well as her incredible sense of humour, were an intellectual pleasure just as they were of invaluable help in my work. She could speak about an event that occurred before World War I, as dramatically and accurately as if it happened last week. I could ring her up and mention a name or an event I did not know about, and she would fill in the gap.

At the same time, we would discuss current events and politics, of which she was just as well informed and had very firm opinions, despite her old age and failing eyesight. When angry about a political folly or a public scandal, she would call me up and express her opinion very sharply.

Sitting and working together for many years drew us close to each other, despite the gap of 37 years between us. Reluctantly, and very slowly, she unfolded her own personal story, which was as interesting as the other stories she told me.

Regrettably, she did not write her memoirs. She was quite capable of doing it, considering her outstanding memory and style, but for some reason she wouldn't. She preferred to devote her time to causes she thought were important. Her strong sense of justice directed her.

There were two or three people she knew, who, she believed, had been wronged by society or by history. Therein she invested much of her energy.

One day she called me up very agitated. "You must help me! Have you read the outrageous article in the local newspaper? It's a shame! It's sheer blasphemy! I know the case perfectly well. I have researched it thoroughly here and in France! The accusations are completely unfounded!"

I knew what she was referring to, but how could I help her?

"You probably hold some additional new material regarding this case, in your archives, please look it up. If you find anything at all, please make a photocopy thereof, for me. I shall carry on from there."

It took me a few hours to unearth some relevant material, which I photocopied and brought over to her. It related to the case of one of her classmates at the Herzlia Gymnasium who had perished in the Holocaust, but who was, nevertheless, accused of collaborating with the Nazis.

"I am convinced of his innocence," she said, "and I shall prove it! If only they bothered to read all the material, as I did! It's not the truth they are after, it's sensation!" She wrote to the man's nephew offering to work with him, then kept writing to politicians and newspapers, in an effort to vindicate the man's name.

All her contemporary history books and biographies are marked with corrections she inserted in her neat and beautiful handwriting, wherever she had found inaccurate information.

Local and foreign researchers used to consult her with regard to specific points that required clarification, knowing they could count on her accuracy. "Sometimes I feel like a Road Junction," she once said, quite pleased.

On a rainy day in mid-October 1994, the great little old lady passed away, at the age of 98. A piece of history of the rebuilding of this country passed away with her.

'Rocket' Richard's star shone in oil as well as ice

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — A Jewish company rescued Maurice Richard from under-employment in the years after his hockey career was over and gave him a job that lasted longer than his two decades with the Montreal Canadiens, says the company's former president, Norman Spector.

Richard, who died last week, was vice-president for sales of S. Albert & Co. for about 30 years. Through the power of his name and personal magnetism, Richard was largely responsible for transforming S. Albert from a small heating oil company whose clients were 80 percent Jewish, to one of the biggest distributors to residences and businesses in Quebec, Spector said.

Spector, who joined S. Albert in 1948 and was running it from 1955, met Richard at a golf game more than 30 years ago. At the time, Richard, who retired in 1960, was living mainly on a small hockey pension, having been spurned by Molson brewery, then the owners of the Canadiens.

Spector had a brainwave – hire Richard and make him a vice-president. Richard readily accepted. Spector thinks it was probably the best move he ever made for the company.

For years, Spector, Richard and the late Danny Albert (grandson of the company founder) were the triumvirate of the company, their names appearing in all its advertising. One memorable newspaper ad was a cartoon of Spector and Richard tooling around in an oil truck.

"[Richard's] job was public relations and he was very successful. Because of his presence, our sales volume increased from 32 million litres to closé to 500 million litres in sales, and S. Albert became one of the leading oil retailers in Quebec," Spector said.

Richard had an office at the company's St. Lawrence Boulevard headquarters, but his job was essentially to be the star attraction at sales promotions.

S. Albert often ran contests for customers in which the prize was a hockey stick signed by Richard.

Richard helped market some of Spector's ideas, like a multi-fuel burner that in emergencies could use coal, wood or even debris for fuel.

The relationship was Richard's first association with Jews, Spector said, and he believes it was "extremely revealing" for Richard.

Spector was a leader in the Jewish community, notably in Combined Jewish Appeal, of which he was chair in 1975, and State of Israel Bonds, which he headed as national president until last month. He also had a firsthand knowledge of the Holocaust, having served with the U.S. army from 1945-48 in the resettlement of camp survivors and refugees.

"Maurice was always willing to come to Bond dinners, to speak at synagogue men's clubs or other activities. Although a fairly devout Catholic, he was totally respectful of Jewish rituals," Spector said.

Spector, who was himself athletic, and Richard were not infrequently seen together at the YM-YWHA. In 1976, when the Jewish community hosted a reception for the Israeli athletes at the Montreal Olympics, Richard did the honour of presenting each one with a commemorative medal.

In person, Richard was "the total antithesis" of the intense, aggressive man he was on ice, Spector said.

"He was a humble, shy and very considerate individual. I'd go so far as to say that he tried to maintain a pious image, he was very restrained. He spoke politely and was very respectful. I never saw him angry. Whatever you requested, he did willingly."

Richard had a particular soft spot for kids and the needy. "I remember a family that had won two hockey sticks in our contest. They came to us with a boy of about 11 asking if he could have one, too.

"They were told the rules didn't allow it. But Richard came to me and said, 'Give him the stick, I'll pay for it.'

"He'd never refuse to sign an autograph and he treated his fan mail as a religion. He would answer everyone, enclosing an autographed photo and a personal wish, such as 'Hope you feel better' or 'Congratulations.'"

Poor families unable to pay their oil bills often contacted Richard and he would turn to Spector and something could usually be worked out.

Richard, in fact, remained with the company – or more accurately, with Spector – until the end of his life, although he was not active in recent years.

Spector insisted that Richard remain with S. Albert when it was bought by Irving Oil in the 1980s (the name S. Albert was retained) and then a few years ago, when Ultramar bought S. Albert and the name disappeared, one of Spector's conditions was that Richard come with him. At 74, Spector continues to work as a vice-president at Ultramar.

Spector was among the tens of thousands who attended the funeral and the visitation at centre ice in the Molson Centre.

Canadian Jewish Congress officially expressed the community's condolences to the Richard family. In a letter, Quebec region president Dorothy Zalcman Howard said, "Like all Quebecers, our admiration and affection for Maurice Richard transcended his unparalleled status as a hockey legend.
